[1] Taken from 1928 reports. [2] Estimated.

Mr. Walker also testified before our committee, as follows:

Mr. WALKER. As I say, it is recommended that the word "foreign" be deleted and thus make the requirements of the bill applicable to all American flag vessels of 250 gross tons and over.

Inasmuch as the function of load-line regulations is to insure, as far as humanly can, safety to life and property at sea, there is no logical reason why the determination of a maximum safe load line should not apply to vessels in the coastal and intercoastal trades with the same force as to those vessels making a foreign voyage by sea. This does not mean that a vessel engaged in the coastwise trade shall be restricted to the same loaded draft as a similar vessel running in a foreign voyage—but if a body of practical men assisted by experts can determine what is the safe loaded draft for a vessel engaged in a foreign voyage, those same practical men and experts can also determine the safe loaded drafts for vessels engaged in coastwise and intercoastal trades.

The determination of maximum load lines for vessels engaged in the coastal and intercoastal trades will tend to the lowering of marine insurance rates for the reason it will put a curb upon the overloading by certain unscrupulous shipowners, which forces, by reason of keen competition, other owners engaged in the same trades to overload their vessels against their better judgment. This overloading results in excessive voyage damages, to cover which the insurance companies must keep up premium rates and, at the same time, it places the lives of the crew in greater jeopardy.

The majority of the shipowners in this country are members of the American Steamship Owners Association. The majority vote of those members were strongly in favor of applying load-line regulations to coastwise and intercoastal vessels as well as to vessels in the overseas trades.

Mr. PEERY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. PEERY. Did he request that any exceptions be made of the three classes you have engrafted on the bill here?

Mr. BRIGGS. Not one that I know of. On the contrary, his contention was that if you are making this bill to provide a line of safety for ships at sea for the passengers and crews, as well as the ships themselves, you should establish it generally.

But your committee has been confronted with a practical proposition that every Member of this Congress has met, and that is the proposition of getting through some load-line legislation. We have had difficulty in getting through any kind of such legislation. First one objection and then another objection has been lodged against load-line bills from those who feared that they might be harmed. There is nothing in the bill, in my opinion, that can be harmful. If you do not overload your ship, you do not suffer anything.

The American Steamship Owners Association, including the large coastwise steamships, admit there is no reason why you should put a load-line mark on a ship going into the foreign service and not on one going into the coastwise service, but you have tremendous opposition from the barge owners threatening the passage of the bill.

We also had opposition from the lumber schooners on the Pacific coast, although they were ultimately willing to accept the provisions of the bill under which the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe the load line for that class of vessels; but when the barge lines went out they wanted to go out, and now we have this further amendment.

I say you now have an opportunity to protect the people of the United States who travel on ships and to protect the crews that go on the ships; and while this legislation which is presented to you evidences some yielding on the part of those who feel that all ships ought to be included, yet some exceptions were made in order that we may get a tremendous and a splendid advance along lines of safety of life and property comprising the great bulk of American shipping in foreign and domestic commerce.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Can the gentleman see any reason why Canadian lumber schooners should be excepted and Maine lumber schooners should not be excepted?

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman must know I can not; and there is no such exception in trade between the United States and Canada; and so far as I am concerned, if exceptions are to be made, I see no objection to your including lumber schooners engaged in coastwise trade as well as those in trade along the coast with contiguous countries, as the amendment already provides. The gentleman who proposed that amendment was apparently satisfied, however, and came from the Pacific coast, where apparently they had the largest lumber trade of that character; and that was the only trade that objected and raised any question about it outside of the barge lines and Great Lakes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT and Mr. BEGG rose.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I simply wish to make a statement in connection with my former question. I simply wish to say that those of us who represent maritime districts on the Atlantic coast have been hearing quite strongly from representatives of the sailing-ship owners and the lumber-schooner owners on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. BRIGGS. I see no objection to it so far as the lumber schooners are concerned. It was my understanding they were really out of the bill, together with those who were dealing with contiguous territory to and from the United States and Canada or Mexico.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. We have heard a great deal about how the shipowners feel about the proposed legislation. I rise to inquire whether or not the representatives of the Seamen's Union appeared before the committee.

Mr. BRIGGS. They appeared before the committee and favored the bill, only they wanted an all-inclusive bill. I have always entertained the same views; but it is a question of what we can get.

Mr. SCHAFER. If it is good for one, why is it not good for all?

Mr. BRIGGS. I think it is particularly good, if you can get it, for all; but if you can not get it for all, let us not deprive the people of the country from getting as much as they can get.

THE TARIFF HEARING

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to speak for one minute out of order.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman can not do that without getting time from the gentleman in control of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has fixed the time.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, so far in the hearings on the readjustment of tariff schedules we have proceeded in the numerical order of paragraphs, but on account of the widely scattered number of people that want to be heard on paragraphs 311, 312, and 313, the administrative schedules, and the drawback provisions, the committee has fixed the hearings on those paragraphs for Tuesday, February 26, at 1.30 o'clock p. m.

LOAD LINE FOR AMERICAN VESSELS

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PEERY].

Mr. PEERY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am heartily in favor of the Senate bill. I think that bill, with some minor amendments, will fulfill the demand for legislation of this kind. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] has told you of the necessity for this legislation as applied to American vessels plying in the foreign trade. I am opposed to most of the amendments which the House committee has put into this bill. We are all in accord with the underlying principle of the bill to provide for the safety of seamen engaged in the performance of their duty, but we are told, and it is manifest here, that if you base it on that principle it should apply to all classes of ships engaged in foreign trade and coastwise trade. I will go with them if they want to make it apply to foreign trade and coastwise trade. But difficulty arises when you come to engraft exceptions on that proposition. When you depart from its application to all vessels and begin to draft exceptions you get into trouble.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEERY. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where are these exceptions the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. PEERY. The exceptions are in section 9, where it excepts vessels of the Great Lakes, barges and lumber schooners that run to contiguous territory.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEERY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman have any information as to the percentage of accidents on the Great Lakes which are due to overloading?

Mr. PEERY. No; I am not a member of the committee, and I am sorry I can not give the gentleman that information.

Now, I want to give you a specific instance. We have certain coastwise vessels engaged in the coal trade and there are barges engaged in the coal trade. That business has grown up under the law as it is; with no load line. If you engraft the exceptions which apply to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and except barges, it is apparent that you may work a serious injustice. For that reason I think that this House should vote for the Senate bill. That is my position.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEERY. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman says that the barge with no load line would give them an advantage over ships that have a load line.

Mr. PERRY. Yes; it would give them an advantage.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has 10 minutes remaining and the gentleman from New Jersey has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I have but one more speaker, and I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to now utilize his time.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH].

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am one who believes that half a loaf is better than no bread. I am one of those who believe that in taking up the question of American shipping we must make a clean-cut distinction between foreign shipping and our strictly local or coastwise shipping. They are two different and separate problems, and I greatly regret that the committee has seen fit to engraft on the Senate bill any regulation concerning our coastwise shipping.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FREE. Does the gentleman know that both the shipowners of the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coastwise shippers have asked to come in under this bill?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I know that, because that appears in the hearings, but so far as Philadelphia is concerned, those who want our flag not to be driven from the seas we feel that the best way to promote the interests of American shipping is not to hamper it by unnecessary legislation. I would like the gentleman to point out anything in the hearings which shows there has been any necessity for this legislation.

Mr. FREE. Does the gentleman know that foreign ships can not compete in the coastwise trade, that it is protected?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes; but the more we hamper American shipping and the more we hinder it by legislation, the fewer ships we will have floating on the seas and the fewer men we will have to sail those ships. No necessity for this legislation has been shown, and I hope the Committee of the Whole will see to it that there is an amendment placed in this bill which will confine the bill to its original purpose, as it passed the Senate. I asked my colleague, Mr. LEHLBACH, as a member of the committee, whether he would sanction such a motion. Whether he will or will not I do not know, but if he does not propose such an amendment, then I have such an amendment which I shall propose to section 9 of the bill, so that all our coastwise shipping, sail and steam, shall be exempted.

Mr. SHREVE. And what disposition does the gentleman propose to make of the Great Lakes?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I understand that the Great Lakes shipping is exempted.

Mr. SHREVE. We want to be sure about that.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes. The amendment which I have in mind is to exempt all lumber ships, whether they go to the United States or South American ports. The more lumber you have on a lumber ship, the bigger raft you have, and you can not sink one. It is a ridiculous proposition to say that a lumber ship can not be loaded below a Plimsoll mark. A Plimsoll mark is not necessary on lumber ships. We get great quantities of hard wood from South America. It comes into the port of Philadelphia and also into the district of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON]. The piano manufacturers and the musical instrument manufacturers need these woods. I hope the committee will confine the bill to its original purpose. If not, I shall vote against the whole bill.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this bill establishing load lines for American vessels, as passed by the Senate, relates solely and entirely to cargo-carrying vessels of 250 gross tons, loading at or proceeding to sea from any port or place within the United States or its possessions for a foreign voyage by sea. The purpose of the Senate bill was to meet the situation that had arisen by reason of the intention of some foreign countries to enforce their load line laws against our vessels entering their ports. If such a threat should be carried into effect, it would be a serious handicap to our foreign shipping. This bill, in the form in which it passed the Senate, would provide the necessary relief to American shipping and would protect our shipping from the delays and annoyances that might otherwise occur. In other words, every necessity from an international standpoint would be taken care of by the bill as it was passed in the Senate. The House committee to whom it was referred, however, has widened the scope of the bill by making it apply to vessels engaged in coastwise as well as foreign trade. While the committee has thus widened the effect of the bill, it has, nevertheless, by the addition of section 9, provided certain exceptions to certain classes of domestic shipping. Section 9 of the bill provides that the act shall not apply to vessels operating exclusively on the Great Lakes, or to barges, or to lumber schooners operating to and from territory contiguous to the United States.

Reasons have been given for the elimination of vessels operating on the Great Lakes, and also barges, but no satisfactory explanation has been given why only lumber schooners operating to and from territory contiguous to the United States should be exempted. My objection to that section is based on that particular exception because it is not broad enough to include lumber schooners plying between our own States. I can not see why there should be any distinction. Whether you look at it from the standpoint of safety to our seamen, or any other viewpoint, there is no reason for a distinction to be drawn between a lumber schooner operating, for instance, between a port in the State of Washington to a port in Canada or Mexico, and a vessel operating between a port in the State of Washington and a port in the State of California. The former schooner is given a preference by the exemption granted it by section 9, while the latter schooner, operating between two ports within our own country, comes within the operation of this bill. Furthermore, I am conscious of the direct bearing this provision has upon my own State and other States that receive lumber by schooners from either the Carolinas or elsewhere.

The effect of the bill, as presently drawn, would undoubtedly increase the present shipping rates and this would add to the ultimate cost of lumber to the consumer. Of course, if safety to seamen was the basic reason, there would be no objection made, but such is not the case. The fact that the committee has exempted lumber schooners operating between this country and contiguous territory is sufficient proof that the element of safety is not necessary to be considered. In fact, the testimony of Capt. Walter J. Petersen, representing the Pacific-American Steamship Association and the Shipowners' Association of the Pacific coast, clearly and forcefully proves the absence of danger in the operation of lumber schooners. On January 21, 1929, he testified before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of this House, and said:

> In a survey of marine accidents and total losses on the Pacific coastwise ships from 1907 to 1928, it will be seen that the overloading of ships has had but little, if anything, to do with the total losses, accidents, or loss of life. * * * There is no record during this period of time of a lumber-loaded steam schooner sinking, as it is practically impossible to sink a vessel loaded with a cargo of lumber.

He then further said:

> There is no record during this period of time of a lumber-loaded steam schooner sinking as it is practically impossible to sink a vessel loaded with that kind of lumber.

Therefore, it would seem that the argument that has been advanced by some that this bill affords a necessary protection to seamen, certainly does not apply to those operating lumber schooners, nor have we been shown why, if it does promote safety, there should be a distinction made between a lumber schooner operating between this country and contiguous territory and one operating between different States in our own country.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I will.

Mr. DAVIS. In reply to the gentleman's question I want to state it has already been stated that exception was made in this particular instance so that our lumber schooners would be at no disadvantage or different situation with Canada and Mexico steamers; but with respect to lumber schooners operating coastwise and intercoastal they will have no competition except by other American steamers, and all of them be on the same footing. That is the reason for the distinction.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Notwithstanding the explanation that has just been given by the gentleman from Tennessee, I see no reason why the distinction should exist, and judging from the statements made to-day upon this floor by members of the committee who have not understood the reason for any distinction in the bill it seems to me that with great propriety the amendment which has been suggested by several Members and that would remove this unwarranted and unfair distinction should be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I regret very much to see the plane upon which this debate has been pitched. Nearly all of the speeches have been predicated solely and alone upon selfishness, utterly disregarding the purpose of load-line legislation, the protection of life and property at sea. Every other important maritime nation on earth to-day has load-line legislation applying to all of its own vessels, both in the foreign trade and in the coastwise trade. For instance, in the case of Great Britain it applies to all of their vessels in the foreign trade and in the coastwise trade and between Great Britain and all of her possessions, and it applies to all vessels of 80 tons or over, whereas we except from the provisions of this bill all vessels of every character under 250 tons. Why have all of the other important nations on earth adopted load-line legislation? Was it because of selfishness? Was it because somebody else had it? Was it because they were afraid that they would be at a disadvantage if they did not adopt it? No; it was done for the purpose of protecting life and property at sea. [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I am sorry I can not, my time is so limited. Now, in other words the representatives of the people in those countries were willing to protect their citizens, both seamen and passengers, upon ships, and legislation of this kind was enacted almost without opposition, even from the steamship interests.

And yet a small minority of the American shipping interests come in here and have been sending their propaganda telegrams to certain Members of Congress misrepresenting the facts, according to some of these telegrams I have seen, wanting to defeat the bill unless they are exempted. If you exempt everybody from the provisions of this bill except those engaged in the foreign trade, you exempt from the provisions of the bill 90 per cent of American vessels. In other words, only 10 per cent of our ships are engaged in the foreign trade. Yet it is a matter of common knowledge that frequently there is as much danger to life and property on coastwise and intercoastal vessels as there is in the foreign trade. We have numerous vessels engaged in the coastwise and intercoastal trade which sail through all the seas, in all kinds of weather, and making trips as long as or longer than many of those engaged in the foreign trade. So that there is just as much reason from the standpoint of danger to apply it to the coastwise trade, as is done in all other enlightened countries, as to apply it to those engaged in the foreign trade.

I, for one, am opposed to the legislation if the coastwise trade is exempted, save the exceptions in section 9, and that was a compromise.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Has the gentleman any information he can give us about the loss of life by reason of overloading in the case of American vessels as compared with those of Great Britain and other countries?

Mr. DAVIS. I can not give comparative figures, but witnesses have appeared before us when, during the last 8 or 10 years, we have been considering this question, who gave us numerous instances where our vessels went down, and the cause assigned was overloading, according to the reports and from all information available. Of course, when most ships go down there is no way of telling why, because there is no evidence left. Marine disasters are very numerous. All that this law does is to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to have load lines placed upon those vessels, and the only restrictions are that these load-line marks shall be so placed that the ship shall not be loaded beyond the line of safety.

This bill will not hurt any shipowner who does not overload his ships. No man will oppose the bill unless he deliberately intends to overload his vessel and thus endanger the lives and property of American citizens by so doing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is no opposition to this bill by sailors before the mast, engaged in the navigation of the ships?

Mr. DAVIS. No. They have always advocated load-line legislation without exception. However, they do not want exceptions made.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But they are the ones who are absolutely powerless to help themselves in the matter?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. Unless we help them, they can get no help.

I regret the grounds on which opposition to this bill is based. Are we not as humane and as solicitous of the preservation of the lives of our citizens as other countries are of their people? If we do not pass this bill with the committee amendments we will not be as considerate as other nations have shown themselves to be of their seamen, of the passengers, and of property.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does this bill apply to vessels with a load on the upper deck?

Mr. DAVIS. That is a question that can not very well be answered, for this reason: Lumber schooners load inside and on the deck, and a different load line will have to be made upon them from that of the ordinary cargo vessel. But the Secretary of Commerce is given the widest sort of latitude, and the amendments which we propose to make to the Senate bill, as you will find, if you will turn to page 2 of the bill, to the amendments there shown in italic type, are for the specific purpose of permitting the Secretary of Commerce to make a different classification and to deal with different classes of vessels in a different way. That was done in the interest of the barges and schooners because they are differently constructed from the passenger or ordinary cargo vessel.

When you say this bill will do an injustice to anybody you say that the Secretary of Commerce will do an injustice to the shipowners. I am opposed to any exceptions, although I will say there is more reason for an exception with respect to the Great Lakes than the others; but really I do not think there ought to be any exception, because it works no hardship upon anybody. It will not hurt any man or any shipowner who wants to do the right thing, and if he is not willing to do the right thing we ought to enact legislation compelling him to do the right thing. However, it was a question of give and take; of compromise, as is frequently necessary. The committee unanimously reported the bill with amendments, including section 9, making certain exceptions; and I will stand by the bill with the committee amendments as reported. The American Steamship Owners' Association, composed of the largest American lines and embracing most of the important lines engaged in coastwise shipping, have indorsed this bill with amendments applying it to all coastwise vessels. They ask that it apply to the coastwise trade and without exceptions. The only objection they now have to the bill is that we have made an exception, as I understand.

A year ago Secretary of Commerce Hoover, recognizing the importance of enacting legislation of this kind, appointed a load-line committee, composed of representatives of all the various different branches of the industry. They have been studying the problems ever since and have had numerous meetings; and this load-line committee has recommended this bill and the amendments we adopted, save the exceptions that were made in certain classes in section 9 of the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read down to and including line 2, page 2.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 1781) to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. My understanding is that to-morrow has been set aside for memorial exercises, and I desire to know whether this bill will be the unfinished business immediately after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

LINCOLN AND DOUGLAS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, an address delivered by Hon. Claude G. Bowers, of New York, at the annual meeting in Springfield, Ill., of the Lincoln Centennial Association, February 12, 1929.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an address delivered by Mr. Bowers at the annual meeting in Springfield, Ill., of the Lincoln Centennial Association. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Claude G. Bowers, of New York, at the annual meeting at Springfield, Ill., of the Lincoln Centennial Association, February 12, 1929:

It is a privilege to participate in ceremonies of this nature in this room redolent of the memory of one of the most memorable utterances of one of the world's immortals. A small room, in a comparatively small building, in what was then a small town—and yet from this little room went forth a phrase which made a profound impression on the minds of men and soon took on the dignity of prophecy. "A house divided against itself can not stand"—a simple phrase, controversial at the time, and yet expressive of a tragic truth.

When Abraham Lincoln thus spoke that day no one could possibly have foreseen that after 70 years this room would seem a shrine because he then spoke within its walls, or that the speaker's name would be revered in every land and clime. For no pompous pose, no pride of opinion, no gasconading glitter and dash set him on a pedestal apart from his friends and neighbors, and he stood among them a simple, unpretentious man with his feet upon the ground. He had literally fought his way from poverty and obscurity and he bore scars upon his soul. He had known disillusionment and sorrow and many rebuffs of fortune, and he was no longer young.

Even in the year of the memorable debates he was not appreciated or understood by those most intimately identified with his campaign. The politicians thought he blundered when he challenged one of the most brilliant figures that ever fascinated a people in the arena of debate. The strategists were alarmed because of the audacity of his utterances. And yet within six years this man who really plowed a lonely furrow all his life had enriched the literature of the language with an immortal oration, had wisely and patiently supervised the preservation of the Union, and had struck the shackles from 10,000,000 slaves.

It is a remarkable fact that the ability, the genius, the breadth and depth and power of Lincoln was less appreciated by his political associates 70 years ago than by his lifelong rival, Stephan A. Douglas. He appreciated Lincoln more than Seward, more than Chase, infinitely more than Sumner. On the eve of the struggle of 1858 he knew he was girding his loins for a supreme effort when many of the folllowers of Lincoln were reconciling themselves to the political burial of their leader.

THE RIVALRY

No two great leaders of opposing forces in all history have been more strangely identified in their careers. When we think of the younger Pitt we think of Charles James Fox, with whom he waged his memorable parliamentary battles of the golden age of the House of Commons. Mention Gladstone and we think of Disraeli. Name Jefferson and the figure of Hamilton moves into the picture evoked. And so with Lincoln and Douglas. They were cast for opposing parts in more than one drama of their day; their lives had touched at many points; and so long as Lincoln is remembered Douglas can not be forgotten.

There has been a foolish tendency to assume that there is something of disrespect to Lincoln in doing justice to the rival who finally, in a crisis, became his most powerful ally. It has been reserved for Mr. Beveridge to do Douglas justice in his monumental biography of Lincoln, and to show that one need not depress the historic stature of the one to maintain that of the other.

Stephen A. Douglas is one of the most majestic figures in all our history. He had a genius for statesmanship. He had constructive capacity of a very high order. He was a master in the management of men and of conflicting forces. In the Senate of Webster, Calhoun, and Clay he met the greatest on equal terms and without a dipping of his colors. There he was the Bayard of debate. He caught the popular fancy as few men have, and his followers were legion in every quarter of the land. He envisioned as only Benton did the westward march of an adventurous people to the redeeming of the wilderness to the purposes of man. It was his statesmanship that molded many States from Territories and ushered them into the council chamber of the Nation. It was his prescience that planned the binding of the East and West with bands of steel, and he led the way. His devotion was to the Constitution, his passion for the Union. He fought throughout his life for one, and for the other he died, at length, as literally as Lincoln.

Lincoln no more underestimated Douglas than Douglas Lincoln.

THE BACKGROUND OF THE DEBATES

The world is familiar with the contacts of these extraordinary men from 1858 until they were broken by the death of Douglas. That which gives something of romance and drama to their relations lies in the half-hidden years before. Here were two men whose birthplaces were separated by mountains and streams and wildernesses of primeval woods, whom fate predestined should complement each other.

By all the dictates of convention all the advantage in the contests of these two men should have been with Douglas. When he first saw the light in a neat cottage in the thoroughly settled town of Brandon, in Vermont, the child Lincoln, in his fourth year, was toddling about a sordid cabin in a Kentucky clearing.

The father of one was an educated and successful physician; that of the other the most tragic of all failures—an unsuccessful and illiterate ne'er-do-well. Douglas had the background of success; Lincoln of failure.

When Douglas was regularly attending school and living in an atmosphere of study the other, deprived of schooling, was trudging weary miles to borrow books, hiring out to the neighboring farms, and finding his companionship in an illiterate population. The environment of Douglas was an incentive to ambition; that of Lincoln was a discouragement.

The year that Douglas was admitted to the bar Lincoln was elected to the legislature, where he was soon joined by Douglas, and these two youths instantly took rank as debaters and managers of men. At this time Lincoln was more the conventional politician; Douglas more the statesman. It was Douglas, not Lincoln, who proposed the constructive measures. The first clash of the two rivals came when Lincoln voted against the election of Douglas as State's attorney.

One year later their contact tightens in their common life in Springfield. Both were deeply engrossed in politics, and neither underestimated then, or ever, the power of the press. Turn the pages of the Springfield Republican of 1837 and you will find the imprint of Douglas's mind; read the comments of the Springfield Journal and you will find the reflection of Lincoln's thought. These men were debating then under cover.

Another year and Douglas, 25 and a nominee for Congress, is elected and counted out and Lincoln's partner counted in, and it was Lincoln who feverishly prepared the defense against an anticipated contest.

Two years more, in 1840, we find them stumping the State in opposition. Often their paths crossed; frequently they drove together; occasionally they divided time; and the renown of both was spread among their partisans.

And then Douglas forged ahead, with his election, at 30, to the House of Representatives. The next three years were the least attractive in the career of Lincoln; the most fruitful in that of Douglas. In the great arena of the Nation the Little Giant was amazing many by his brilliancy as statesman and debater. His stirring defense of Andrew Jackson immediately fixed his status as a partisan; his arguments on constitutional construction established his standing as a thinker, and he was compelling attention by the nationalism of his views that knew no section. There was something of Websterian majesty in this bright youth of Illinois that captivated Congress and captured the imaginations of the people far beyond.

Thus while Lincoln was resorting to the common, uninspiring methods of politicians seeking a congressional nomination, Douglas was moving to the Senate, and soon these great rivals were under the dome of the Capitol together.

THEY MET IN CONGRESS

Lincoln entered the House without prestige of any sort and left in two years without the enhancement of his reputation, and during these two years Douglas was sweeping forward, looming larger, and ever more imposing in the public eye.

Now, note this evidence of their relative positions. In those years two men were minutely keeping diaries in the Capital. John Quincy Adams loved to gossip with himself in the privacy of his journal and to record his opinions of public men with whom he worked. Time and again he found occasion to mention Douglas; not once did Lincoln's activities or personality impel him to record his name. At the same time President Polk was daily writing in his diary of events and people at the Capitol and White House, and scores of Members of both Houses figure in his pages. Douglas is mentioned times without number; and there is not a line in the "Diary of Polk" to indicate that he knew of the existence of Abraham Lincoln.

And how different their lives in Washington! While Douglas was moving in the gay circles of a brilliant society, Lincoln was amusing himself in a bowling alley; while Douglas was busy with conferences and on the floor, Lincoln was delighting his colleagues with characteristic stories in the cloak rooms; while Douglas was a leader of the leaders, Lincoln remained one of the most inconsequential and unimpressive of the rank and file.

This then is one of the mysteries of Lincoln—9 years before the great debates, 11 years before the presidential struggle in 1860, no human prescience could have foreseen the possibility of the reversal of their positions.

INCUBATION OF THE GREAT LINCOLN

Manifestly the five years between Lincoln's retirement to private life and his return to politics were the most fruitful and yet mysterious in his career. No one understood better than he that he had failed to measure up to his opportunities. It is impossible to believe that he did not make disheartening comparisons of himself with Douglas, with whom he started out. To one of his ambition, and I reject the bizarre theory that he had it not, this must have been gall and wormwood. In the quiet five years that followed he underwent a metamorphosis intellectually and spiritually. He had the time to take a sober inventory of his equipment; to weigh the comparative worthlessness of his achievements; to measure the things for which he had striven against the realities; to meditate for the first time selflessly upon the conditions and the movements of the times. He came to know himself in the long rides on the circuit, in the lonely vigils of the country taverns, and in the silences and the solitudes, far from the cheering multitudes that beset and confused Douglas, he found the time to turn his philosophy into a formula and to strip the outstanding problems of the hour of their legalistic wrappings and reduce them to simple moral terms.

Thus when the Kansas-Nebraska act called him again to face his old antagonist it was a new Lincoln that appeared—a deeper, sadder, stronger, simpler, humbler, firmer Lincoln, convinced of the elemental truth of his position. Henceforth until the last phase, while Douglas was dealing with who we now know were phantoms and fighting shadows, Lincoln, with inspired vision, was struggling for the eternal verities on which depend the cause of humanity and the ultimate preservation of democracy.

THE ORATORS

A comparison of Lincoln and Douglas without a reference to their oratory would be the omission of an essential; for Lincoln was perhaps the only one of the Presidents who owed his elevation to his eloquence; and Douglas won his position by his extraordinary mastery in argument and speech.

Douglas was more debater than orator; for oratory at its best implies imagination, emotion, a sense of poetry, and a capacity for spiritual exaltation, in all of which he was deficient. But in the field of parliamentary debate he carried forward the noblest traditions of the art, and ranks with the younger Pitt. If he fell short of Charles James Fox, it was because he lacked the latter's imagination and sympathy, which frequently interspersed his arguments with the purple patches of the finest eloquence. But he resembled Fox in the molten rush of his fervent argument. To him debate was a battle, and he sought to take the enemy by storm. He marshaled his facts as a master disciplinarian marshals his battalions. When the problem was simple, and he was munitioned with the facts, there was everything that was irresistible in the devastating sweep of his logic; when the field before him was studded with pitfalls of adverse truths, no one could hurdle them or evade them with more felicity and plausibility.

It was his fluency, his familiarity with his subject, and his ardent manner that set him apart from the political orators of his day. His enemies resented the impression he invariably conveyed of absolute honesty, and I, for one, am thoroughly convinced that he could always reconcile his course with his conscience.

And yet his was a mind that moved in the grooves of convention—a legalistic mind that knew no higher law than that which is written in the statutes; he made no appeal to the heart; he spoke to the mind alone.

Thus while there are many to whom he might be compared, there is no one with whom to compare Lincoln—among the moderns he made a style. He had one advantage over Douglas: His training was in dealing with the plain people of the farms, the villages, the workshops with whom plain speaking and the homely phrase are necessary. Among these he lived. He knew the way to their minds and, better still, to their hearts. He studied the psychology of the mass mind in the familiar conversations of the country store; he mastered simplicity of expression through necessity; he learned the virtue of the homely illustration and the humorous touch; he knew what the academic scholar little suspects that in the heart of the most elemental there is that strain of poetry through which Christ wrought his revolution and entered into the heart of humanity.

Thus Douglas was the speaker of the Senate and Lincoln of the open spaces and the market places. One was the logician; the other was the orator. One was an advocate; the other was an artist.

And that to me is the most amazing thing of all. For Douglas, living from boyhood with men of education and scholastic training, lacked the literary impulse; and Lincoln, unschooled and for many years deprived of books, developed a passion for the precise word and phrase that made him the artist that Douglas never became.

This literary impulse of Lincoln was comparatively late in development. It was only after his return from his unfortunate experience in Congress that we find him in the throes of composition struggling for the precise word, the illuminating and the haunting phrase. This he mastered as no other American orator.

Thus his advantage over Douglas. The throbbing, pulsating multitude listening to the two were pleased according to their partialities or politics—each convinced that his favorite was the master. But the real test comes when the voice of the orator is still and his personal magnetism is withdrawn. Then one could remember only the general impression of the Douglas speech; but one carried away from Lincoln's some immortal phrase expressive of an eternal truth that goes singing through the generations in the hearts of men.

Posterity knows that Douglas spoke; it knows what Lincoln said.

AS POLITICIANS

Now, both were consummate politicians, else neither would have had the chance to demonstrate capacity as statesmen, and here they differed too. The measure of a politician is his capacity to anticipate and mold and lead public opinion, as well as to organize and direct the movements of men. Lincoln and Douglas resembled in their common possession of intuition. This in politics is the quality that stands for genius. Both possessed the trait which for want of a more graceful word may be called cunning. They knew how to play force against force, prejudice against prejudice, interest against interest, and to set machinery in motion without appearing on the scene.

Both understood the virtue of organization; both assiduously cultivated the leaders down to the trenches, and both under cover made cunning use of the press in the creation of sentiment.

But they had their differences and these are important.

Douglas was dictatorial; Lincoln persuasive.

Douglas was arrogantly commanding; Lincoln was gently conciliatory.

Douglas moved among his worshippers of the rank and file with the haughtiness of a conqueror; Lincoln mingled with the common workers with the familiarity of a comrade.

Douglas issued ukases with the rattling of the sword; Lincoln, like Jefferson, insinuated suggestions with a smile.

Douglas's domineering nature impelled him to plunge impetuously into needless danger; Lincoln moved more cautiously and with greater circumspection. What Essex was to Burleigh, Douglas was to Lincoln.

Sagacious as both men were as politicians, it is a strange coincidence that each in the supreme crises of his career encountered opposition and embarrassment from his own party. In the senatorial contest of 1858 Douglas was forced to fight not only the natural enemy but the concentrated power and prejudice of a Democratic administration; and Lincoln in the Presidency was constantly harassed by the congressional leaders of his own party. A Democratic Senator had to fight a Democratic President, and a Republican President had to submit to the hectoring of a Republican Congress. And now with the passing of the passions of those days of struggle, the Muse of History has given its approval to Senator Douglas and to President Lincoln.

THEIR FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES

It is possible to show that on the fundamentals of government Lincoln and Douglas were not remote. Both avowedly were disciples of Jefferson. One as well as the other subscribed to the Jeffersonian theory of State sovereignty. Douglas preached it aggressively all through life; Lincoln less frequently, and yet he was elected in 1860 on a platform pledged to the preservation of the rights of the States.

Both consistently declared adherence to the Jeffersonian doctrine of the rule of the people, and the most unpopular acts of Douglas's life were based upon that theory. And yet Douglas was less the professing disciple of the Sage of Monticello than Lincoln, who quoted him frequently and declared that "the principles of Jefferson are the definitions and the axioms of a free society."

But when a Jeffersonian principle of government for the people was involved in Jackson's Homeric battle against privilege and the rule of money in the fight on the national bank, we find Lincoln fighting with the Whigs on the side of Biddle and privilege. The first time these remarkable rivals met in joint debate was in this city, one in defense and the other in denunciation of Jackson's destruction of the bank. And yet scornful as Lincoln seemed of Jackson in those days when in the most solemn moment of his career he retired to a room for the preparation of his inaugural address he took with him a copy of the Constitution and Jackson's nullification proclamation, and nothing more.

Douglas was a militant Jacksonian from the beginning of his career. Lincoln became a Jacksonian in the crisis of his life. It was the Jacksonian spirit that moved Douglas in his battles to keep down the spirit of disunion; it was with Jacksonian weapons that Lincoln sternly put it down when it reared its head.

If we find inconsistencies in the lives of both, it must be borne in mind that both were party men, and on the minor issues that come and go were loyal to the party program, but on the elementals they were very close. They both believed in government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and where either deviated from the principle in practice it was a concession to party harmony or to meet the political exigencies of the moment. In all vital things they were robust champions of the distinctively American conception of the proper relations of the people to the State.

ON ABOLITIONISM

In the last days of their rivalry these gladiators crossed swords on slavery—and yet, even here, they had their contacts. They were agreed that the institution of slavery was protected by the Constitution; that under the constitutional guaranty the owners of slaves were entitled to protection in their property; and that the fugitive slave law was in accord with the fundamental law of the land.

There is nothing of record to show that Lincoln, any more than Douglas, approved of the provocative methods of the extreme abolitionists, their contempt for the Constitution, or their indifference to the Union. If he did not indulge in public criticism, he was in private life and need not speak; but Douglas, fighting against all extremes that were driving the Nation toward disunion, was forced to speak. His hatred of the abolitionist was the hatred of the law-abiding man for what he conceived to be lawlessness; of the practical realist for what he thought to be a destructive idealism; of a lover of the Union for what he knew to be a force making for the destruction of the Union. He attacked them openly, vigorously, repeatedly, contemptuously in the Senate and on the platform; and they hung him in effigy in Boston and hooted him in the streets of Chicago. Neither Lincoln nor Douglas expressed sympathy with Lovejoy or John Brown. That is the reason Sumner stained his scholastic lips with vulgar epithets hurled at Douglas, and the reason Wendell Phillips called Lincoln "that slave hound from Illinois."

And there was a personal reason why neither could sympathize with the extreme abolitionist view of slavery and slave owners. The father-in-law of each owned slaves; the wives of both had black mammies in their childhood; and neither was a stranger to households overrun by slaves. Douglas, familiar with plantations, had seen no Simon Legrees, and Lincoln never forgot the patriarchal atmosphere of the Speed home in Kentucky. They each knew that good men and women lived in the land of slavery, and both were repelled by the unmeasured denunciation of the people of the South.

ON SLAVERY

With the passing of time, a tradition has grown up that Lincoln in his early years swore an eternal war on slavery; but it was 20 years after he saw the slave auction episode in New Orleans before he deeply concerned himself with the problem. Until the last phase was reached the difference between Lincoln and Douglas on the morals of slavery was this—Lincoln had declared slavery unjust; and if Douglas believed slavery wrong he never gave utterance to the thought.

Now, it does not follow from Douglas's silence on the morals of slavery that he thought it right. There may have been other reasons for his silence. As a youth in Congress he had read the dire possibilities of slavery agitation by the red flare of the burning abolition pamphlets taken from the mails. He knew that agitation aimed at the greatest property interest in the South threatened the perpetuity of the Union—and he was as passionately devoted to the Union as Jackson when the nullification reared its head. For that he would have put down the agitation, right or wrong, since he could see no solution through Federal action. One who paid tribute to his memory when he died has given in a sentence one sufficient reason for his silence on the morals of the institution—"he never criticized a wrong for which he did not provide a remedy"—and he saw no remedy.

Thus for years Douglas, in close contact with the Southern extremists in the cloak rooms of the Capitol, knew better than even Lincoln could have known in Springfield, the desperate danger to the Union—and he concentrated on its preservation, with slavery or without. Thus the mistakes he made; the compromises for which, like Webster, he has been damned—he loved the Union more than he hated slavery.

And so, too, in the end, when men were fighting and falling on bloody fields, Lincoln assumed a position not dissimilar when he said that if he could save the Union by freeing part of the slaves, he would; if by freeing all the slaves, he would; if by freeing none of the slaves, he would—but he would save the Union.

Thus the paths of these two majestic rivals led at length to this common Jacksonian ground—"the Union—it must be preserved."

DOUGLAS RECRUITING FOR LINCOLN

It were superfluous to dwell on the great debates—these have been described and characterized through 70 years. Never in human history a more epochal contest involving two men of greater genius, honesty, or courage.

Nor can aught now be gleaned from reviewing the story of the campaign of 1860 when they contested for the Presidency. With the sectional division of the Democracy, the inevitability of Lincoln's triumph was soon forseen. Here at Springfield Lincoln awaited the result in silence, resting his case on the arguments of the great debates.

But there was no rest for Douglas; and so for weeks he feverishly swept over the country, looming larger than Lincoln, for the moment, in the drama of those tragic times. Permit me to suggest that it was with the realization of his defeat that Douglas rose to his greatest stature as a patriot. If he was lost, the Union might still be saved. The candidate was merged in the patriot, the politician in the statesman, and soon the Nation fairly rocked with his burning denunciation of the extremists on both sides. Sweeping into the South he served notice that the election of Lincoln would not justify secession, and that the Union, cemented by the blood of all sections, would be maintained, if need be by the force of arms.

The first and greatest recruiting officer that Lincoln had was Douglas in the last days of that campaign.

AFTER THE ELECTION

And now the election is over; the simple man at Springfield has risen on his misfortunes to the supreme height of power; the brilliant, dashing rival of the Senate has been cast down by fate. All over the South the rumblings of preparation for resistance are heard. And with Lincoln, more than helpless now to speak the word or do the act to stay the movement, we see Douglas hastening to the Senate to do what he, better than any other public man, could do. He sought to do what Clay with his aid had done before—to hold the States together yet a while and calm the storm. He tried to shame and crush the extremists on both sides—there was no other way. Did he criticize Lincoln and his party? Give him credit for the strategy and psychology of the act—he was seeking to stay the hands of men who honestly believed that Lincoln's election meant the solidification of the North against the South.

And he failed—the day of compromise was over.

DOUGLAS JOINS LINCOLN

And with the realization of the fact Douglas put all partisanship aside and moved in the full panoply of his power to the side of Lincoln to sustain him in the fight for the preservation of the Union of the States. On the eve of the inauguration we see Douglas pleading with Lincoln for his consent to a constitutional amendment to remove the slavery question from the field of congressional debate and hear Lincoln give consent.

And then the day of the great defiance of the forces of disunion—the scene on the east portico of the Capitol, when Lincoln took the oath with Douglas sitting by his side to hold his hat. I challenge you to search the records of the great rivalries of all time and find me a more thrilling picture for a canvas.

It was not Douglas alone who stood there that historic hour at Lincoln's side—there, too, were the more than a million and a quarter men who voted for Douglas in the nonseceding States whom he represented there that day.

And now, one other picture, more inspiring still. It was on the day that sent a cold chill to the hearts of the people when secession unlimbered its guns and fired on Sumter. It meant war. It was war. The hour for argument and persuasion was now past. The challenge to the Union has been made. The day has passed and night has come, and there are lights in the windows of the White House, and a carriage stops near midnight at the portico, and a man alights, and a moment later Stephen A. Douglas has reported to Abraham Lincoln for duty! The rivalries of the years have dropped away; the political differences are forgotten; and among all the millions in the land these two men, whose unity of purpose was most essential to the salvation of the State, sat down together at a table with a map to plan a campaign of defense. And when, that night, the word flashed over the wires to the four corners that Douglas had been with Lincoln and had pledged himself "to fully sustain the President in all his constitutional functions, to preserve the Union, and maintain the Government," a million Douglas followers saluted the President and prepared to march.

More epochal than the conference of the Roman triumvirate to divide the world at the fall of Caesar was this midnight conference of Lincoln and Douglas to save a nation from disunion—and more inspiring.

And now the call goes forth for volunteers, and now Douglas, worn and sick, is rallying the friends of the Union to the standard here, there, and everywhere, and now the footbeats of many marching men and the flying of the flag and the sound of the fife and drum.

And then, too soon, one summer's day, crowds throng the street before the hotel in Chicago where Douglas lay dying. The death of Douglas was one of the greatest casualties of the war. He fell on no bloody field, but none the less his was an immolation on the altar of his country. And though his spirit passed, it lingered yet a while a determining factor in the policies of men and it flashed in the swords of the McClernands as they turned to the battle fields; and it hovered, too, about the lonely man whom Douglas crossed so many times in life—hovered about him when so many of the living stayed away.

What a rivalry! What a union! These choice spirits who met in early life in opposition, and through the many years went their divergent ways, had met at last with a common purpose, a common passion, a common patriotism, on the top of the hill besides the guns where fluttered the flag of the Union to the preservation of which they both gave up their lives.

Had Lincoln and Douglas died on the same day in the first year of the war, the historical status of the martyr would not have been much more impressive than that of his lifelong rival. The Lincoln of history and of immortality was developed or brought out by the sufferings and struggles of four blood-soaked, tear-drenched years of ineffable loneliness and anxiety. As he passed through the flames all that was ordinary or small in Lincoln was consumed and all that was fine and noble was left, and thus he stands on the pedestal of eternity a figure of pure gold. His patience, his prescience, his unerring sense of justice, his generosity and genius, his tenderness and magnanimity made for soldiers in the field and their families awaiting their return a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night. The politicians scorned him to the end of his life, and the plain people will love him to the end of time.

These two marvelous men who fought each other throughout their lives will live in a companionship of glory, vivid and imposing, through all the countless generations yet to be.

THE DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks upon the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, the House and Senate conferees have agreed on the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1930. The magic $9,000,000 lump-sum contribution of the Federal Government to the District is confirmed, sanctioned, and sanctified for another year.

GOVERNMENT BY RULE OF THUMB

My objection to adhering to the unchangeable fixed sum of $9,000,000 as the annual contribution of the Federal Government is that it is arbitrary, illogical, and unscientific. It is not even a rough and ready "rule of thumb"—for such rules always attempt an approximation and are generally short cuts to fairness and justice. But no one can logically defend the inexorable, steadfast, and unvarying nine million lump sum, because its accuracy will always be challenged as the District appropriation varies—as it always does—from year to year.

HOW THE RATIO HAS VARIED FROM YEAR TO YEAR

For instance, in the fiscal year 1925 the $9,000,000 lump sum was 30.8 per cent of that year's appropriation; in 1926 it was 31 per cent; in 1927 it was 27.6 per cent; in 1928 it was 28.4 per cent; in 1929 it was 28.6 per cent; and in the current bill for 1930 it will be about 28.4 per cent. Such a method of handling so delicate a matter is unbusinesslike and reflects no credit on the intelligence that maintains it.

Sooner or later we must face the issue frankly and boldly and establish a formula that will bear some recognizably just relationship to a budget, which in the very nature of things inevitably varies from year to year.

GUESSWORK VERSUS CALCULATION

When this controversy was at its height last year the defenders of the lump sum maintained that the primary obligation of the Federal to the District government was the amount of taxes which Federal-owned property in the District would be obliged to pay at the current tax rate of $1.70. They estimated this at $6,000,000 and maintained that the Federal Government therefore was awarding a gratuity of $3,000,000.

I made some study of the subject and arrived at $7,055,000 as the amount of the Federal tax obligation. According to my figure, therefore, the Federal gratuity—although I do not like the word—was $1,945,000.

HOUSE DOCUMENT NO. 506

Not being able to agree among ourselves as to the basic figure of the Federal tax obligation, the aid of the Bureau of Efficiency was invoked to determine the precise figure. Its report, published recently as House Document No. 506, discloses that the Federal obligation on the basis of tax indebtedness on Federal property amounts to $7,440,000.

This fixes the gratuity involved in the $9,000,000 lump sum as $1,560,000. Thus the defenders of the lump-sum principle are faced with three separate figures of the amount of the gratuity, namely, $3,000,000, $1,945,000, and $1,560,000, but, no matter what the margin is, they seem to be ready to maintain that whichever one turns up in their calculation is perfectly just and proper, a contention the mere statement of which shows its inherent absurdity.

Of course, it is difficult to say precisely what should be the amount of this gratuity or contribution; in other words, what the margin should be above the mere indebtedness of the Federal Government as a taxpayer.

WHAT ARE THE OBLIGATIONS OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT?

Having now reached the point where we can say what the Federal Government ought to pay as a mere taxpayer, it is generally agreed that we ought not to stop there. The Federal Government is not a disinterested taxpayer. It is the instrumentality for which, and by which, the District has grown into a city of some consequence.

The country demands a capital worthy of the Nation, with broad streets and avenues, capacious and attractive parks, and public buildings of a high order of merit.

All of these things attract a continuous stream of visitors. Washington is a city of historic background and associations. It is the Mecca toward which the youth of our land come daily in constantly increasing pilgrimages. A huge traffic from all parts of the Nation encumbers its streets and uses its parks and other municipal facilities. The Nation itself should contribute a part of the upkeep of such national features.

TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION IS TYRANNY

The residents of the District are disfranchised. Their morale timbre is depreciated. They are taxed without their consent and governed by instrumentalities they have no influence in shaping or directing.

It constitutes a serious blot on our system of government. It is the one striking anomaly, the most marked inconsistency in the whole circle of our Government. It implies—yes; more than implies—it actually is a tyranny; and that, too, in a nation founded on the maxim, "No taxation without representation."

THE MAGIC "NINE MILLION"

I had a dream and beheld a vision. It seems I stood at the base of the Peace Monument, and as I mused I heard a voice cry "Behold!" Looking up, I saw two trains of figures descending from the Capitol. As they approached I noticed that one group was clad in white Roman togas, while the other wore colored yogi gowns—their heads topped by what were once called "plug hats." All wore patriarchal beards.

On reaching the plaza, they fell into one column and marched with stately tread along the Appian Way. I followed at a respectful distance—

> As we passed along we passed a load of hay,
> But whither it was going I would not dare to say.

After marching a few blocks or squares the cavalcade turned to the right into the forum, or what was once called the "community center," a great plaza flanked by magnificent marble buildings.

Here a great concourse of inhabitants was milling to and fro in great agitation and confusion. Some carried banners on which were inscribed various strange mottoes, such as "We want paved streets," "We want more schools," "We want street lights," "We want sewers."

As the bearded column approached, a stentorian voice cried out "Peace! Here come the conscript fathers!" And there was silence.

In the center of the forum was a raised marble platform on which stood a mysterious figure, and as he stood up to greet the conscript fathers the people all cried out in a loud voice "Hail to the oracle."

After a few words of salutation the oracle proceeded promptly to the business of the hour. "Fellow inhabitants," he said, "we have assembled here to-day to fix the amount of the annual contribution to be paid by the imperial Government toward the upkeep of this magnificent Capital for the fiscal year 1980 anno Domini. [Loud cheers.] The assessed valuation of the imperial property within the District confines amounts to so many million dollars, and the amount of tax due thereon would be so many million dollars. We will now proceed to determine in a scientific manner according to the ancient science of numerology the amount of the imperial contribution."

He thereupon passed around among the conscript fathers a pack of what looked like playing cards and requested a number of the fathers to draw. When nine had drawn, the cards were taken up and spread on an altar, and the oracle picked them up and read off certain figures. These were copied off on a large blackboard. He added, subtracted, multiplied, and divided; but, no matter what the figure, he invariably reduced the result by either one or the other of these processes to $9,000,000.

Closing his eyes as if in deep reflection, he suddenly opened them and with a lofty glance of exaltation declared: "Fellow inhabitants, you will observe that there has been no deception. You have seen that no matter how we shuffle these cards the fates seem to decree that we invariably arrive at the magic figure of $9,000,000; and that, therefore, will be the imperial contribution for the year 1980 anno Domini; the fates be kind to you. The assembly stands adjourned."

THE CRUISER BILL AND THE IMPORTANCE OF NEW ORLEANS AS A NAVAL BASE

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the cruiser bill and the importance of New Orleans as a military naval base.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objections.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, if one will stand before a wall map of the United States, such as is issued by the Department of the Interior, he will be rewarded by securing a liberal education in a short time and with the exercise of a minimum of energy and a modicum of intellectual effort, he will understand why we need a navy. For this is a map not only of continental United States but includes the Territories and insular possessions as well, and shows the extent of public surveys, Indian, military, and forest reservations, railroads, canals, national parks, and other details. The great geographical and historical epochs in our history are graphically set forth; for these so-called details show the territory of the original thirteen States, the Louisiana Purchase from France in 1803, the Texas Annexation in 1845, the Oregon Territory acquisition in 1846, that which was ceded by Mexico in 1848, the Gadsen Purchase in 1853, the Alaskan Purchase, the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands, the Canal Zone, and Guam. Each will one by one claim the interest of the student of our marvelous territorial developments, as every one of these distinct steps in the growth of the United States has a history and romance of its own. But that feature of the map which has an absorbing interest for the American who looks at it frequently out of a sheer love to grasp the greatness of our territorial expanse is the Mississippi River and its tributaries. Down from Lake Itasca in Minnesota it comes in a zigzag and tortuous course until it strikes the Gulf of Mexico. Joining it at different places in its mighty course are great tributaries that run from the Alleghenies westward and from the Rockies eastward. This river, so small at its beginning that a man may jump across it, broadens out in a lordly and majestic way until it is about a mile wide in the vicinity of New Orleans, by which it sweeps onward to breast the eternal sea. The stream so insignificant in its beginning is toward its end one of the greatest rivers in the world. It carries from its tributaries a cubic mile of earth annually, suggesting the tremendous change that is going on in this vast part of the continent.

The surface or top soil, the richest farm land in the valley, is being carried southward building up an alluvium in the Gulf of Mexico which will surpass in fertility the banks of the Nile, the Euphrates, or the Tigris. All of that land was once claimed by Spain by a right of discovery; for Narvaez, one of her conquistadores, passed by the mouth of the Mississippi River in 1528, on a trip from Vera Cruz to Florida. For be it remembered that the ownership of territory and the government of those occupying it was a fixed principle of international law known as the right of discovery. And the discovery of a river carried with it the tributaries of that river and all of the land drained by the main stem and the affluents to the possession of the sovereignty of the discoverer. That river literally divides the United States east and west. It was on that river the Battle of New Orleans was fought. That battle determined that the Louisiana Purchase should remain a part of the United States and not be another Canada westward of the Mississippi River, which would have forever precluded the flag of the United States from waving along the shore of the Pacific Ocean. It was the possession of that river secured by Farragut in 1862 that broke the backbone of the Confederacy and made for this country remaining a Union of indestructible States. Out of that river flows an enormous commerce and into it from every part of the world come riders of the sea whose cargoes are carried northward by the Inland Waterways Corporation and barge line or by the railroads that connect with every part of the country. Millions of bales of cotton are transported from the Father of Waters and the other Gulf of Mexico ports and harbors. That export makes for the prosperity, yes, the very living of a large section of the United States. Above New Orleans is the Standard Oil plant. I am going to here insert a statement made by Mr. A. C. Bedford, chairman of the board of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, on May 25, 1925, in connection with a proposed bridge across the Mississippi River near New Orleans, a matter that has now been adjusted to the satisfaction of the parties who were then in controversy:

STATEMENT OF MR. A. C. BEDFORD, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, STANDARD OIL CO. OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. BEDFORD. General Taylor, I am glad of an opportunity to say a few words to you with reference to this proposition, not at all, of course, from the technical side, because that I do not pretend to be familiar with, but perhaps a statement of some of the reasons which led us to establish our large plant at Baton Rouge would be pertinent to the discussion which we are having here to-day.

Some of the reasons which determined the company to decide upon this location were due to a good many causes, because we believed it made an ideal location for a refinery. In the first place, it is the first highland on the Mississippi inland from the Gulf; it sits 20 feet above high flood, the highest flood ever known in the Mississippi Valley, which, of course, is a very vital consideration in the establishment of so large a plant. Moreover, it had a feature which is very vital to a large operation of that character, in that it is an excellent labor center; we have obtained a splendid water supply; the climatic conditions are such that we can operate to great advantage during the whole period of the year; living conditions are good; our labor has been happy and contented; and our turnover is remarkably small for an industry of that character.

Another point was—and this is a very vital one—that it is the shortest location on the navigable waters of the Mississippi River from the oil fields of Oklahoma, Arkansas, and northern Louisiana. Now, to a refinery that, of course, is absolutely essential. We must have two things if we can get them:

We must have deep water and we must have access to the producing fields. This situation is more ideal than any other location.

The greatest producing fields that we have in the United States are the fields of the mid-continental basin, from which we draw our largest supply of oil. Seventy-five per cent, at times, of the production of this country has come from that field. We do not, of course, know how long that is going to last, but if you will ask oil men to-day, men who are conversant with the facts, they will tell you they look upon that territory as the basis from which we are going to secure the bulk of our supply for a very long period of years to come. There is a very large amount of oil still left in the ground. Seventy-five per cent of the oil is still within these sands, to be gotten out. It is merely a question of price with regard to getting that oil out. The oil that is there is going to be available for the needs of the country and the oil business for a great many years to come. It is very expensive to get it out, and that is the reason it has not been taken out before. Methods must and will be devised for getting the oil when the time comes, and as oil becomes more costly we must get out the very large amount of oil that still remains in that territory.

Major General TAYLOR. I have seen statistics recently to indicate that at the rate we are using oil at the present time the supply of this country would be exhausted in about 10 years. Do you agree with that?

Mr. BEDFORD. I do not agree with that at all, sir. The matter, however, has got to be studied very carefully, and will be taken up and discussed with the President's Conservation Board. The whole subject will have to be gone into very thoroughly. I have seen some statements by the Petroleum Institute with reference to that matter, and I think that they are going to be able to assure the country that no danger exists of any immediate diminution of the oil supply, such as you have indicated, that that need not be considered at the present time.

Major General TAYLOR. That is a very vital question in this connection.

Mr. BEDFORD. Another point about this is that this location affords deep-water transportation. I have spoken of the accessibility to a pipe line. Now, as to our getting the oil to the refineries from other sources, because we must get oil not only from one source but we must get it from other sources as well, so that we have there at that location cheap water transportation, making available to this refinery the sources of crude oil supply from Mexico which, as you know, have been very prolific; from South America, which is now looming up as one of the great producers of the world. I might say, incidentally, that we are now building in Central America a pipe line that is going to cost $12,000,000, in order to open up a field there, the products of which will come up to this refinery. So in addition to Mexico we have that field in sight. We also will get oil from other markets in the world. I might say that we have a large production to-day in Peru. That oil is being brought through the Canal.

We also found it very necessary here a year ago, in fact, during the last two or three years, to bring a very large quantity of oil from California. The amount of oil brought from California to the Atlantic coast during the time of the great production in California amounted to at least 300,000 barrels a day. We were bringing, in our own vessels, anywhere from 50,000 to as high as 75,000 barrels a day at one time. That meant more than an average of one vessel a day, and a very considerable amount of that oil went to the Baton Rouge Refinery for its supply. At that time there was some oil in the central part of the country that was being used in other directions, and it was very essential for us to have a supply, and it was a very available source of supply.

Any vessel can enter the mouth of the Mississippi River and come to Baton Rouge, as matters are now, with safety, either by night or by day. I am told that the construction of a bridge of the type proposed here would impair this very favorable navigation condition.

I might speak of another matter that is worthy of consideration and which has been touched upon, and that is the probable scarcity of crude oil. If there should be a scarcity of crude oil in this country, then, of course, we have got to go abroad for our supplies of crude. We have been supplying 75 to 80 per cent of the world's needs in oil. If the time comes when we will have to get some of our supply from abroad because of the diminished home product, then a great deal of that oil can come from South America, and from the investigations my own company has made it is shown that there will be very good opportunity to secure the supply in that territory.

Most of the large refineries of the country are located on the coast or on the Gulf. Probably 70 per cent of the refining capacity of the mid-west is in the mid-continent field.

Now, one of the important propositions about the whole business is that our pipe line can be put into reverse, the oil can be sent up from the coast in reverse process through the pipe line; in other words, it can be pumped the other way. We have a large-capacity pipe line coming down from the mid-continent field for the purpose of supplying the refinery at Baton Rouge and also for the purpose of carrying the crude oil to our other refineries along the Atlantic coast. Now, if we assume for the sake of argument that the oil supply from the mid-continent field should diminish and we wanted to get crude in from abroad, we could then simply reverse the process in the pipe line and send the crude up through the mid-continent field and protect that great area of country. It would be a simple proposition. As a matter of fact, that can actually happen and actually did happen years ago, when we first established a refinery in Chicago—in 1908, I think it was. We had to take the oil in from the Illinois field and pump the oil from the Illinois field to Chicago, and when the mid-continent field became a potential factor and the Illinois field began to fall off, and we needed the oil at the Atlantic seaboard, we simply went in reverse and pumped the oil down by Chicago through the pipe line and around through and on to New York to the refineries there. That is a thing that actually occurred. That is a possibility.

Furthermore, the location of the refineries on the Mississippi River means cheap water transportation for the marketing of our product, not only in the interior, through the tributaries of the Mississippi and the Mississippi itself, but through the Ohio River, and so on, and it gives us cheap transportation which we must have if we are to compete with others who bring in oil all along our Atlantic coast. A large amount of the supply through all that section of the country, from the Gulf north to Maine, is supplied from our refinery at Baton Rouge, and we make distribution all along the coast by coastwise vessels; and we also ship a large amount of oil abroad. It also, of course, has the advantage of splendid rail distribution which enables us to supply a very large amount of territory naturally tributary to that location.

There is another matter, General Taylor, to which I would like to call your attention, and I am sure you will appreciate that it is of very vital importance in connection with this matter of the navigation of the Mississippi River, and that is that the State of Texas is now a very large producer of crude oil and has great potentialities along that line. This oil is brought from the center of the State down to the Gulf coast by pipe lines, it is brought from Texas City around by steamer to Baton Rouge refinery, so that it makes available, through the water transportation which we now have, that field, the supplies that are needed at the Baton Rouge refinery.

There is another matter that I believe is of vital national importance in the consideration of this subject, and that is that this refinery's location on a fresh water inland harbor 240 miles from the Gulf renders it impregnable against attack by land or sea, which is of critical importance to the Nation in time of war. This point is of particular importance. A very large part of the refining capacity in the United States is located on the Atlantic and Gulf seaboard, and due to their location are more or less subject to destruction from the sea in time of war.

The refinery at Baton Rouge is substantially the only large refinery located inland but sufficiently near to the seaboard and with access to the sea that there is in the United States. Its importance in case of war might become very vital to the safety of the Nation at a critical time.

I make that statement not as an argument in relation to this particular thing but to impress its importance upon you. We all know what a tremendously important part oil played in the war. Lord Curzon, you will remember, stated "that we floated to victory on a sea of oil." Everyone remembers the critical situation during the war, when a commission came over from the other side, sent over by the British Government, and a member of that commission sent for me immediately when he landed, and I called on him at his hotel and we had a long talk, and the most important thing that they had to consider was the supply of the necessary oil for the fleet. I was chairman of the oil board during the war and know exactly what I am talking about, and I know what the conditions were at that time. In addition to the information I had there I had telegrams from the French Premier and President telling us of the critical conditions that existed at Verdun, and we knew that oil had to be produced as fast as possible. The result was that we restricted our production of by-products at the Baton Rouge refinery, and our Baton Rouge refinery played no small part in furnishing the necessary fuel oil and gasoline at that time. We simply made a skimming plant of it, turning our attention entirely to the production of fuel oil and gasoline just as fast as we could. We put aside our other products and just did that one thing.

Now, I think it is an actual fact that if, during a critical period, the navigation of the Mississippi had been blocked for 10 days—and I think, perhaps, the mayor (Behrman) will bear me out—if it had been stopped for 10 days the war would have been lost. It was a very vital thing at that time, and that is what the navigation of the Mississippi River might mean at some time when the safety of the United States might be at stake. Now, here is a refinery which at all times is so located, so situated, that it can furnish the necessary oil for war purposes, and I believe it is necessary to take every precaution to see that the navigation of that river shall be made safe.

The confidence we have felt in this strategic industrial location can be best evidenced by our investment of substantially $40,000,000 at Baton Rouge and over $75,000,000 in the State of Louisiana as a whole. I think the State of Louisiana is rather proud of this industry. We have tried to be good citizens; we have tried to establish there an industry for the benefit of the State; we have obeyed laws, we have lived with its people, and we have built up there a substantial industry which has done a great deal for the State as well as for ourselves. As a matter of distinct economic interest, it may be stated that since our company's entry into Louisiana 16 years ago it has spent over $250,000,000 in wages and salaries, freight payments, State and local taxes, and for the purchase of crude oil produced by others than ourselves.

Our confidence and judgment in the selection of this site have been abundantly justified by the splendid record accomplished; the efficient and economical operation of this refinery has encouraged our company year by year to spend upon it huge and ever-increasing sums for its expansion, to a point where it will shortly become one of the world's largest refineries, with a crude distillation capacity of 80,000 barrels daily to coke.

This company is the largest single user of the Mississippi River, having handled 3,223 ocean-going cargoes exceeding 27,000,000 net tons and over 3,000,000 net tons by river barges, an aggregate of over 30,000,000 tons, substantially 180,000,000 barrels of oil having thus been handled by the company during its 16 years of existence. Our operations last year were the largest in the history of our company.

We have established there an industry which we believe is beneficial to the Nation and to the locality, as well as to the industry itself, and we hope nothing will be done which will impair the usefulness of that location and of that great enterprise.

I remember very well some years ago coming down the river, when we came just inside of that point, and I noticed in the distance a ship coming up bedecked with flags. I was told that was the A. C. Bedford, and that was the first time I had ever seen the ship which was named after me. It was built in California. It was explained to me at the time, and I remember it very well, because I was somewhat anxious about the vessel—it was explained to me the difficulties of navigation, especially at that particular point. Now, if anything should be done to add to those difficulties and to jeopardize these great industries I submit it will not be in the national interest.

That statement, in my judgment, shows the importance of New Orleans as a naval and military base, although that was not its purpose. It shows the necessity of maintaining the navy yard at New Orleans as a going concern, though that was not its purpose. That yard is to-day inactive, inoperative, though there are many shore stations from Charleston northward on the Atlantic coast and an extraordinarily large number of shore stations on the Pacific Ocean. The Atlantic and Pacific coast lines are well supplied with shore stations, distributed in the judgment of many students of national defense in a most illogical manner. The only excuse that can be offered for the present distribution is that like Topsy the situation has grown that way. To those who are philosophically inclined this is not strange, for everything in our civilization is the result of an illogical growth, or, rather, it is not the result of a well-planned or a scientific system. If anyone has any doubt on that subject let him read Emerson's Essay on Education.

I represent the district in which the New Orleans Navy Yard is located and though it might cause some of the cynical to snicker I am going to make the statement that I am not interested in the maintenance or development of that yard from the standpoint of patronage, or as a seeker of fishes and loaves. Nor am I an Oliver Twist with his cup out for more soup. I am a Democrat, and not looking for patronage for obvious reasons. But I do believe in national defense, and at the risk of incurring the suspicion of those that are not mindful of a scientific and well-balanced distribution of shore stations, I am going to insist as I have in the past insisted that the navy yard in New Orleans should be made operative and active. If there were but three navy yards, one on the Atlantic, one on the Pacific, and one on the Gulf at New Orleans, that one at New Orleans would be the most important for the reason that may be gathered from the remarkable and illuminating statement of Mr. Bedford. That statement alone shows, though that was not its purpose, the importance of New Orleans as a military and naval base, for it is at the bottom of the river that winds its way through the heart of North America. Railroads might be cut and thus prevent an enemy from proceeding inland from New Orleans, but he could use the river and reach every city in the valley, for there is not a fort along the banks of the great stream or its tributaries. But when his statement is studied in connection with the exports and imports that so vitally concern the Mississippi Valley and its well being it carries conviction that New Orleans is the great base for the United States. It is unanswerable in its implications and inferences. We have not forgotten, I hope, the plight of the cotton-growing section of the United States during the World War, when, as a result of a blockade declared by Great Britain, with its zones neutral and unneutral we were unable to move a bale of cotton. So desperate were our cotton growers that in hopes of easing off an unendurable situation we started the "buy-a-bale movement."

I will not weary the reader of this or the officials who may notice it with statistics and details but suffice it to say that the North Atlantic States have profited to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars from the operation of navy yards and private shipyards, in both of which were built and repaired Navy and other vessels, though no one believes that a naval battle will ever be fought in that vicinity. Hundreds of millions have been spent along the Pacific coast. My section of the country, looking at it purely from the standpoint of that fairness in governmental operation which makes for sectional equality in the benefits flowing from national expenditures, has received but little but does not complain. Even Jackson Barracks has been abandoned as a military reservation, and now there is not a soldier to be seen on the banks of the mighty river in its lower reaches. If one has any doubt about the very large number of shore stations in operation let him read these pages from the Navy Directory under date of October 1, 1928:

I do not believe that any one doubts the fundamental soundness of a public policy which requires the Nation to maintain navy yards and military posts on the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf, particularly on the Gulf, because it is in the Gulf of Mexico or the Caribbean Sea that the naval battles will be fought out, should we grip with any trans-Atlantic power. As a matter of fact, though it is trite to mention it, all of the approaches to the Panama Canal are under the control and in the possession of Great Britain. I have no doubt that our navy yards could be made to serve a very useful purpose in peace times in addition to discharging an absolutely necessary function during a war period. A navy yard should be so situated that it can take care of vessels damaged and injured during an engagement. From this standpoint New Orleans, which is neglected, is the most advantageous site and should be the most desirable from the national defense standpoint. I have no doubt as a fundamental policy of government whose purpose ought to be the national defense and at the same time a desire to minimize the chances of war that navy yards on the Atlantic, Pacific, and the Gulf ought to be maintained for the purpose of building and repairing naval vessels exclusively, thereby avoiding the propaganda, the pressure, and the danger that may result from the desire of private shipbuilding plants when idle to secure employment for their workers and enrichment of the owners by yelling vociferously and suspiciously for more battleships and cruisers in order to insure the national defense. War is hell, as was declared by Sherman and probably expressed by others long before him in different phraseology. But its meanness, its sordidness, its dirt, its pestilence, fever, and death are rendered far more hideous, dreadful, and revolting when it is thought that wars are generated and lengthened out by the cry and at the instigation of those who profit out of war.

I hope that the officials of the Navy and the Army will read these remarks. I hope they will see New Orleans as the military and naval base that I see it. I hope that some day there will be a relocation and a redistribution of our military and naval establishments. I hope and most fervently hope that the day is not far off when a strongly crystallized public and national opinion will demand that all of our war instrumentalities, including even the uniforms that the men in the service of the country wear, shall be made, built, constructed in Government plants, yards, and arsenals.

Take the greed out of war. Take the thought of profit out of our grappling with some other fellow across the Atlantic or the Pacific over a matter that might be determined by conference. Remove the influence of propaganda that emanates, radiates, and thunders from private interests that become so engrossed with profits as to forget the rights of humanity. Commerce, industry, finance, agriculture—all offer private enterprise great and magnificent fields in which to operate. Let them exploit those fields and make for a finer civilization even than that which we now enjoy. But render unto Cæsar that which is due unto Cæsar. Let the Government exclusively discharge the function of a national defense which will include the building of all war vessels and the making of all munitions and the supplies that are necessary for the support of an Army and a Navy. Give us a proper national defense. Put into operation the New Orleans Navy Yard, because it is one of the few stations that can be justified from the national-defense standpoint, as it is essentially a most important military and naval base.

A great controversy has raged since the advent of private shipyards as competitors with the navy yards as to the cost of operation in both. This matter was gone into in a large way in the hearings on H. R. 10967, to relieve unemployment among civilian workers of the Government, to remove the financial incentives to war, to stabilize production in Federal industrial plants, to promote the economical and efficient operation of these plants, and for other purposes, conducted by the House Committee on Naval Affairs in November, 1922. A great deal has been said about the extravagance of the cost-plus system which prevailed during and shortly after the war, and the unparalleled extravagance of that system, which lead to a conviction on the part of those that knew that war indeed is hell.

But why light candles when the sun shines bright? Why ignore the obvious? Does anyone expect the private shipyards to hold that they are less economical units than Government navy yards? And how can the Navy Department admit its lack of economy in administration without practically alleging the incompetency, the ignorance, the incapacity of the men whom the people of the United States have spent hugely to educate at Annapolis?

But back to the river, even as a dreamer:

> And I long for the dear old river
> Where I dreamed my youth away;
> For a dreamer lives forever,
> And a toiler dies in a day.

The control of the Mississippi River is as important to-day as when the pioneers who had threatened even to the setting up of a new republic to wrest the control of it in its lower reaches, from New Orleans to the Gulf, from Spain or France or both. Dwelling contiguous to its east and west banks, in a day when there were no highways or railways, the free navigation of the Mississippi was life to them, while lack of control meant death. If it were not for their menacing attitude, it is doubtful that Jefferson would have consented to the purchase of the Louisiana Territory, which carried with it the full possession and control of the great river.

The control of the river to-day by an enemy who could penetrate to all parts of the valley by barges capable of carrying thousands of soldiers would not only prevent the movement of commerce northward and southward but eastward and westward. It would cut the West off completely from the Atlantic and Gulf. Strategically it will always be the key to the military operations that might on some tremendous day be inaugurated against the heart of the Republic, and therefore its absolute and exclusive possession is essential to that domestic commerce that must move in war as well as peace. I submit these remarks in the remote hope that they may prove of some value to my country. Should they fall on deaf ears, that will not lessen my affection for the Army and the Navy nor affect in the slightest way my conviction in the safety and sanity of an adequate national defense. If I have at any time directed a criticism it was done in the hope that it might better the service.

This Republic must be prepared at all times for the thunderbolt that might be hurled by Mars at any time, for who can tell what a day may bring forth? That preparedness should not be of such a character as to precipitate the very catastrophe we seek to avoid. But it should be adequate, well balanced, rounded, symmetrical, and as scientific as a national defense can be planned. And the motto of that system should be "Semper Paratus." Let us strive to reduce the chances of war. Let us try to prevent war, but we should never forget that war is at times inevitable, for we dwell in a world of force.

That should always be with us, for it is a realization that the law of force rules all things animate and inanimate that will make for our safety and reduce the chances of war.

Brutal that law and grim. Across this orb
Hurled through the ghastly trackless depths of space,
Sweet visions, dreams, and glowing phantasies;
Then fade and pass—one law alone holds place,
The law of power, immutable and old.
For life that dwells upon this sphere of clay
Thus it is writ, the powerful shall survive,
The strengthless weak decay.

Behold: For ye were not the first to rise;
There have been others in the gulf of time.
And after you come others still to come,
That clay can not be cast in form sublime.
Ye may not mold a diamond from the mud
Nor form a lustrous pearl from salty tear,
In other worlds may other laws prevail;
Ye can not change them here.

IMMIGRATION QUOTAS BASED ON NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I present several telegrams urging the repeal or postponement of the national-origins clause of the immigration law.

I ask that the telegram from the 14 members of the Massachusetts General Court of Scandinavian ancestry, and the other telegrams, representing Scandinavian organizations in Massachusetts, be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., February 18, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Massachusetts Senator, Senate Building, Washington, D. C.:

The 14 members of the Massachusetts General Court of Scandinavian ancestry respectfully urge you to use your influence to repeal the section of the immigration act of 1924 which, if put into operation, will discriminate unjustly against and greatly reduce the number of immigrants to the United States coming from Scandinavian countries of Europe. The Scandinavians have proven themselves desirable.

EDWARD J. SANDBERG, Quincy, Mass.,
JOSEPH L. LARSON, Everett, Mass.,
Representatives for the Delegation.

WORCESTER, MASS., February 19, 1929.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.:

Is Congress going to adopt an immigration law that is contrary to both the Democratic and Republican platforms of the 1928 conventions? Your constituents look to you for a square deal. Support the repeal or postponement of national origin act to cut the Scandinavian quota two-thirds, with a distinct loss to the United States of America. May we look to your leadership on this measure?

SVEA (Swedish Newspaper),
A. H. TRULSON.

BOSTON, MASS., February 14, 1929.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Massachusetts Senator,
United States Senate Office Building:

As president of the Swedish Charitable Society, I want to express the sincere feeling of our twenty thousand and odd numbers toward the unjust discrimination against the Scandinavians brought out by the national-origins clause. These constituents urge you to do your best toward repeal.

ELIAS B. FORSLIND,
Chairman, 28 Reynolds Avenue, Everett, Mass.

BOSTON, MASS., February 14, 1929.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Massachusetts Senator, Senate Office Building:

May I ask you to work strongly for the repeal of the national-origins clause, which certainly is unjust to the Scandinavian countries? It is the sincere feeling of the Swedish-Americans of Boston, and it is to be hoped that some other solution of the immigration question can be found.

CARL W. JOHANSSON,
Swedish Vice Consul.

BOSTON, MASS., February 14, 1929.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Massachusetts Senator, Senate Office Building:

Urge you propose any possible reconsideration of the unfair national-origins clause in behalf multitude Scandinavian-Americans of greater Boston.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The Vasa Committee of Worcester, representing the 10 local lodges of the National Order of Vasa, with a membership of 5,000 in Worcester, respectfully urge your support to the repeal or postponement of the national origin act now before Congress.

WORCESTER, MASS., February 17, 1929.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of many Scandinavian voters, I appeal to you for action to repeal or postpone the national origins act as entirely contrary to the best interests and welfare of our country.

FARMERS' MARKET IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. TYDINGS presented a letter from T. B. Symons, director of cooperative extension work in agriculture and home economics, State of Maryland, College Park, Md., relative to the relocation of the farmers' market in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION WORK IN AGRICULTURE AND HOME ECONOMICS, STATE OF MARYLAND,
College Park, Md., February 5, 1929.

Hon. M. E. TYDINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I write to express the hope that you will oppose House bill 8298, on the calendar of the Senate, providing for the relocation of the farmers' market in southwest Washington and authorizing appropriation of $300,000 for this purpose.

If this bill should become a law it will change the entire character of the farmers' market, which has been serving the citizens of Washington for many years. The most accurate estimate that can be secured on the business conducted on the farmers' market shows that at least 30 per cent of the more than $2,000,000 business has been retail; that is, consumers buying direct from the farmers.

The purpose of a farmers' market is to furnish an opportunity for the consumer to buy direct from the producer. This bill violates this purpose.

Regardless of the wholesale feature and the arguments against the location provided for in the bill, it contemplates the purchase of a tract of land wholly unadapted for use as a farmers' market.

May we hope that these facts will cause you to give serious consideration to defeating this bill and in lieu thereof provide for the appointment of a competent commission to study this important matter further and to report its findings to Congress?

As director of the extension service of this institution I have no interest in this matter save that of public welfare. We are naturally keenly interested in facilitating the economical marketing of farm products. We hope that a model farmers' market may be erected in the city that will be of utmost service to both the consumer and producer.

Thanking you for your careful consideration of this matter, I am,

Very truly yours,

T. B. SYMONS, Director.

Mr. TYDINGS also presented a letter, in the nature of a petition, signed by John S. Blick, president of the Washington Convention Hall Co., and 60 farmers of Maryland and 27 farmers of Virginia, relative to the relocation of their business at the Convention Hall Market, at Fifth and K Streets NW., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, as follows:

WASHINGTON CONVENTION HALL CO. (INC.),
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1929.

HONORABLE SIR: As the bill for the location of the farmers' market—that is, the Stalker bill passed by the House of Representatives which would locate the farmers' market in southwest Washington—will come up for action by the Senate in the near future, it seems to us that every Senator should be advised of the latest development with respect to this site.

As fully 85 per cent of the people of Washington desire a site located north of Pennsylvania Avenue, as evidenced by the support and vote of 95 per cent of the citizens' associations, the advisory council, the unanimous vote of the Association of Women's Clubs, the Secretary of Agriculture, 90 per cent of the farmers, and various other organizations, we wish to bring to your attention the fact that at the instigation and proposal of the farmers a meeting was held in the offices of the Convention Hall Market Co. Friday, February 1, 1929, at which this company made then an offer of space on the property of this company suitable for conducting their business at the same rate as that in vogue at the present time, namely, 20 cents per day, said rate to continue for as long as they see fit to occupy this space. This proposition was accepted by the farmers, and on Saturday, February 2, 1929, a committee of farmers obtained the signature of 104 farmers, agreeing to relocate to this site in a body on Thursday, February 14, 1929. This list was obtained in one day and from the farmers who were located on the farmers' line on this day only. We were advised that this list could be increased to 350 through the signatures of others who were not on the farmers' line on this day.

We beg to submit for your consideration a list of the farmers who signed this petition, the original of which can be seen at the offices of this company.

There is to be held a meeting at the offices of this company on Friday, February 8, at 4 p. m., of farmers, merchants, and such others as may be interested for the completion of plans for the occupation of this site to be used by the farmers for the conduct of their business. We earnestly request that you be represented at this meeting in order that you may obtain information that is not only vital to the farmers, who absolutely refuse to occupy a site south of Pennsylvania Avenue, but which is vital to the citizens of this city, especially if you intend to vote for a southwest Washington site.

Very respectfully,

CONVENTION HALL MARKET,
By JOHN S. BLICK, President.

Mr. TYDINGS also presented a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of farmers doing business in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 14, 1929.

HONORED SIR: A mass meeting of farmers, representing the more than 350 who have signed an agreement to move their business to Fifth and K Streets NW., unanimously adopted the following resolutions on this date:

"Whereas the public press has indicated that proponents of the Stalker bill to establish a farmers' market in the southwest section of the District of Columbia are seeking to force that measure through this Congress; and

"Whereas the public of Washington has overwhelmingly expressed itself as opposed to the location of the market on the river front in an isolated spot; and

"Whereas a majority of the dealers formerly in business on the old B Street site have removed their activities to a new and improved farmers' produce market at Fifth and L Streets NW.; and

"Whereas the new location has been made available at no expense to the taxpayers of the District of Columbia, but, because it is centrally located and means a saving in time and money for the public: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this mass meeting of farmers, merchants, and citizens do hereby protest against further consideration by Congress of the Stalker bill.

"Ordered, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the chairmen of the Senate and House District of Columbia Committees and to the press of Washington."

J. H. CRAIG (Vienna, Va.),
L. J. HARRISON (Anacostia, D. C.), Committee.

GEORGE WASHINGTON MEMORIAL

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Mrs. Susan Whitney Dimock, of the city of Washington, in regard to the George Washington Memorial, may be read, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on the Library. The people of the country are deeply interested in the splendid work of the George Washington Memorial Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The letter was read, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

1301 SIXTEENTH STREET,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1929.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CURTIS: The George Washington Memorial Association, of which I am president, has determined to proceed at once to complete erection of the George Washington Memorial. We realize that unless this edifice, with its large auditorium, seating 11,000, is ready for use within the next three years, there will exist in the city of Washington no suitable and sufficiently large building in which to house the magnificent ceremonies being planned for Washington's Birthday in 1932. February 22, 1932, will be the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, and it is already apparent that the American people, aided by foreign admirers of Washington, will join on that day in paying tribute to the memory of the first President of the United States to a degree unparalleled in the history of memorial celebrations.

As you know, in 1913 Congress donated a suitable tract of land in the city of Washington upon which was to be erected a memorial edifice in honor of George Washington. The idea of a memorial edifice found its origin in a desire, frequently expressed by George Washington, and written in his will, for the establishment of an institution for the general diffusion of knowledge and for the promotion of science, literature, and art. The task of planning, obtaining funds for, and erecting the building was intrusted to the George Washington Memorial Association, a corporation, composed of well-known Americans and having, among others, William Howard Taft, Elihu Root, and John Barton Payne as members of its advisory council.

The association, desirous of erecting an edifice that will take first rank among memorial edifices of the entire world, and bearing in mind the expressed wish of Washington referred to in the foregoing paragraph, decided upon a building that in addition to being architecturally beautiful and imposing, and in respect of grandeur second to none in existence, would also carry out Washington's desire by housing a very large auditorium to be used as a place of assembly by conventions and conclaves of every character, whether national, international, or State, whether business, political, religious, patriotic, or social.

Accordingly, the George Washington Memorial edifice, when completed, will house an auditorium seating 11,000 people, which will be made available to meetings in the city of Washington through the Smithsonian Institution, which will have charge of the administrative work of the memorial after its erection.

There will also be a number of smaller meeting halls, seating from 500 to 2,500. That these meeting halls, and particularly the main auditorium, will be of immense practical advantage to the American Nation as a whole is evident when we consider the numerous groups, desirous of meeting occasionally in Washington, who have been unable to do so because of lack of just such facilities as this memorial will afford.

In 1921, in the presence of an imposing audience, the corner stone was laid. President Harding made the principal address. The foundations are completed. It remains now to provide from seven to ten million dollars with which to complete the erection.

The memorial will become the home to several important historic exhibits. Not only will there be mementos of Washington, and of Revolutionary days, but there will also be collections of trophies, documents, and records representative of all periods and all phases of American history. The George Washington Memorial will be a very important American historic museum.

It is reasonable to assume that the commission appointed by President Coolidge to recommend a program for the bicentennial celebration in 1932 will desire that the central celebration on that day be held in the city of Washington, the Nation's Capital, and the city founded by and named for George Washington. Unless arrangements are made at this time for completing erection of the George Washington Memorial edifice there will be no building in Washington of sufficient capacity.

It is of equal importance, too, that the 1932 celebration be held amidst suitable surroundings, commemorative of his greatness. The exhibits in the memorial will provide the desired appropriate atmosphere.

The Hon. Charles Evans Hughes will deliver a radio address over a nation-wide chain of stations on the evening of Friday, February 22, 1929. Mr. Hughes, who will begin his address at 7.30 p. m., will explain details of the George Washington Memorial, and will outline a plan for popular subscription whereby ever man, woman, and child in America will be afforded an opportunity to participate in the erection. The association plans to accept subscriptions in amounts as low as $1, having in mind that this memorial should be truly the result of public donation.

In view of the foregoing, and in the light of your own interest in this project, I earnestly request that you invite the attention of the Members of the United States Senate to our current plans for erecting the George Washington Memorial edifice, and by public announcement urge all patriotic Americans to avail themselves, on Friday evening next, of the opportunity which Charles Evans Hughes will afford them to learn first hand of the memorial and plans for its construction. Mr. Hughes will speak from station WEAF, New York City, over the National Broadcasting Co. chain.

Very sincerely yours,

SUSAN WHITNEY DIMOCK
(Mrs. Henry F. Dimock),
President, George Washington Memorial Association.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana obtained the floor.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will yield for a question only.

Mr. EDGE. I wish to make a very brief statement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Very well.

Mr. EDGE. The unfinished business, it is well known, is Senate Joint Resolution 117, authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal. I understand that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] desires to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside in order that he may call up the naval appropriation bill. I simply wish to state that I am entirely satified that this should be done, but I give notice that I propose as vigorously as possible to press the consideration of the unfinished business in order that other business may take its place. With an appropriation bill pending, I am, of course, entirely satisfied that the unfinished business should be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield for a question only.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAINE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is still detained from the Senate by illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. BRATTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. LARRAZOLO] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to submit a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator from Kansas for that purpose.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

Mr. CURTIS. I submit the unanimous-consent agreement which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on Monday, February 25, 1929, at not later than 6 o'clock p. m., the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., and that at the evening session, which shall not continue later than 11 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to ask the Senator from Kansas when we are going to have a morning hour?

Mr. CURTIS. I hope we can adjourn to-night and have a morning hour to-morrow. I intend later to ask unanimous consent for an evening session to consider unobjected bills on the calendar, and still later for an evening session to consider bills on the calendar under Rule VIII. We shall have a morning hour to-morrow if it is possible to do so.

THE PROHIBITION LAW

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am anxious to proceed with my address.

Mr. BRUCE. I merely wish to ask to have something printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will yield for that purpose, if it leads to no discussion.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post and an article from the New York Times relating to the prohibition question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial and article referred to are as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Monday, February 18, 1929]

THE PROHIBITION LAW

Senator REED of Missouri tells the truth in declaring that the prohibition law is not only not enforced but is made the means of hypocrisy, crime, corruption, graft, demoralization of justice, and fraud upon both Government and people. Powerful as is Senator REED'S arraignment of the hypocrites and criminals who take advantage of the prohibition amendment and the Volstead law, he could have made it more powerful and still remained within the bounds of truth. But even if he should publish the names of all Members of Congress who support the prohibition law and then violate it, and should expose every official who makes dishonest money out of the present blundering attempt to suppress the liquor traffic, the fact would remain that the American people have outlawed the traffic and are supporting efforts to make their will effective.

If any improvement is to be made in existing conditions it does not lie in increasing the penalties for infractions of the law. Senator JONES'S bill, if enacted, will only make matters worse by stimulating perjury and violence on the part of prohibition violators. If he should prescribe death as the penalty of every infraction of the Volstead Act it would still be violated, but in the violation there would be a train of perjury, murder, and gangster terrorism following the violations.

The fundamental fault lies in the mistake made by the people when they transferred the police power of the States to the Federal Government. Prohibition or regulation of the liquor traffic is essentially an exercise of police power. The United States Government is not reorganized in such fashion as to make it possible for it to exercise the police power effectively. Its attempt to do so within the States stirs up a hellbroth of confusion and corruption. The more actively the Government interferes and the more severe the penalties it imposes the greater is the resistance and the more habitual is the corruption of Government agents.

If the people should conclude that highway traffic had passed beyond the control of the States and should empower the Federal Government to regulate it, a situation would arise similar to the attempt to stamp out the liquor traffic. Federal agents would have to be stationed at every crossroads, Federal traffic courts would be set up, millions would be expended, and yet the public would violate the traffic laws, corrupt traffic officials, and find sympathy and support in all State officials.

Wherever public opinion favors liquor prohibition the law can be made effective, but where public opinion opposes prohibition it is not in the power of the United States Government to enforce the law. In other words, where the State exercises its police power the law is enforced, and where the State refuses to exercise its power the Federal Government can not enforce the law. It is not a question of money, men, or severe penalties. It is a question of attempting to use a Government controlled by the people to enforce a law that is opposed by the people.

Two other constitutional amendments are opposed by the people of certain States. The whole Nation tacitly accepts this situation and very sensibly refuses to attempt to use the power of the Government to enforce the amendments in those States. That is what must happen in regard to the prohibition amendment if it is not repealed. In the States which oppose prohibition there will be an abandonment by the Federal Government of its attempt to enforce the law.

When the United States Government bars out foreign liquor and prevents its transportation between the States it has done its full duty. The authority to enforce the law within the States rightfully belongs to the States. When the Federal Government enters a State and tries to exercise the police power it creates the situation that now exists.

ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED MINISTERS ASK CHANGE IN DRY LAW—EPISCOPAL CLERGYMEN SUPPORT SOCIETY'S FIGHT ON "WORST FOE OF TEMPERANCE"—VOLSTEAD ACT THE TARGET—BUT IT MAY BE HELD NECESSARY TO ALTER EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT TO TRY CANADIAN PLAN—SOCIETY EXPLAINS STATUS—SAYS CHURCH HAD TO DISSOCIATE ITSELF FROM CAMPAIGN TO AVOID BEING IN POLITICS

The Church Temperance Society, which professes to voice the sentiment of the majority of the clergy and members of the Episcopal Church, although denied the position of official spokesman, issued a call yesterday for support of a movement to modify the prohibition laws—a movement to which 1,500 ministers of the church already have pledged cooperation.

The call was contained in a statement to be published this week in the Churchman, an independent religious periodical. It was designed to end "misapprehension" regarding the society's "relationship" to the church and to restate the society's opposition to "compulsory total abstinence" as the worst foe of temperance. The statement was signed by Archdeacon J. H. Dodshon, president; the Rev. William P. Taylor, secretary; the Rev. James Empringham, general superintendent; and the Rev. C. A. Livingston, chairman of the executive committee.

HOLDS VOLSTEAD ACT NOT "HONEST"

Declaring that the Volstead Act "is not an honest or a scientific attempt to define an intoxicant," the society makes a plea for its revision "as the first step toward obtaining that measure of public support without which no law in a democracy ever can be enforced." If that is not enough, the society continues, "it will ultimately be necessary to amend the eighteenth amendment so as to permit the introduction of the Canadian system of governmental control," which has "eliminated the saloon, while we have merely changed its name to 'speakeasy,' and done away with beer, the one harmless thing it sold."

Although the society admits that the modification movement is "certain to fail at first," it holds that victory can be won "if we do not shirk the task."

"It is the duty of everyone who believes that the Volstead Act either should not or can not be enforced to write to his Senators and Congressmen urging modification," the statement continues. "We are told it is impossible to change the law. The same thing was said about the efforts of the drys to have Federal prohibition laws adopted. Is it as impossible to change the law as it is to enforce it, or can we acquiesce in leaving things permanently as they are?

ELECTION NOT A REFERENDUM

"The election was not a referendum on the prohibition issue. Apart from the wet victories in the Montana and Massachusetts referendums, it is necessary only to point out that five States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and Maryland—are so strongly opposed to prohibition that not one of their 10 Senators is a dry—yet they voted for Mr. Hoover.

"But it is not only on the present opponents of the Volstead law that our hopes for the future are founded. We believe also that when a majority of the drys in the country realize what enforcement would really mean, they will not approve of it themselves, let alone believe that they can force the country as a whole to accept it. When this time comes, all but a few of the fanatical extremists (who would rather brand any drinking as a crime than reduce the actual amount of drunkenness) will prefer the honorable course of modification to the cowardly hypocrisy of nullification.

"Fifteen hundred Episcopal clergymen have offered to cooperate with the Church Temperance Society in a campaign to obtain more practical legislation in the interest of temperance. This campaign has only just begun. If the American people are once roused from their lethargy, they will end the present orgy of anarchy and corruption; and in order to arouse them it is necessary only for our religious and civic leaders to abandon the silence which most of them have maintained hitherto."

TEMPERANCE AIM STRESSED

The issue between modification and enforcement, "the only honorable alternatives," must be fought out in the court of public opinion in a spirit of fair-mindedness and scientific searching for the truth without appeal to fanaticism or abuse, the society's statement says, insisting that the real end of prohibition, "which is temperance," must not be forgotten. The present policy of retaining the law "regardless of whether it is enforced or not," the society says, is the policy of nullification, which is neither honorable nor conducive to achievement of the desired end.

Real enforcement of the present laws in communities "where a majority or even a large influential minority of the public opposes them" is impossible, the society concludes, "without resorting to methods of the most extreme oppression and cruelty." Among such measures, it says, would be:

"The imposition of prison sentences only, since a fine means no more to a bootlegger than a saloon keeper's license; the elimination of trial by jury in liquor cases as the only means of getting such sentences imposed, or even of dealing with the cases fast enough; the institution of an army of agents, spies, and reformers, highly paid to improve the personnel and to reduce the temptation to graft; together with the building of innumerable new courts and prisons; and all this at a vast cost which would involve a great increase of taxation rather than tax reduction, and render impossible such vital social measures as farm relief."

Regarding its relationship to the church, a matter which was in controversy after the first publication of the results of a poll in which 3,000 Episcopal clergymen declared themselves as opposed to prohibition, the society, in its latest statement, conceded it had no authority to speak for the whole church.

The church, "in justice to itself," the statement points out, had to dissociate itself from the prohibition propaganda which the society undertook in 1917, since "this was putting politics into the church." Then it adds:

"The same reasons which caused the Council of Bishops to dissociate themselves from our prohibition propaganda at a time when a majority in the church probably favored it now prompts them to hold aloof from a movement in favor of modification."

But since this is the case, the society contends, there is more need of an "unofficial organization" like itself "to discover and express the consensus among individual Episcopalians on this the most pressing of all moral problems."

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives insisting on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 39 to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 39. I will state to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that we have held conference after conference on the bill. I insisted that before I would ask that the Senate recede from the amendment there should be a vote on the amendment in the House of Representatives, not a standing vote, as had been previously taken, but a yea-and-nay vote. On yesterday the House voted upon the amendment, and there were 304 against the amendment and 28 for it. Under the circumstances there is but one of two things which we can now do: We can either recede from the amendment or still further insist upon it. From the experience which I have had in the consideration of the bill in conference, it seems to me it is useless to try any further to get the House to yield on No. 39, which is the condemnation provision inserted in the bill by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I can not yield further for the discussion of this matter. I desire to get through with what I have to say, and then the debate on the amendment to the Interior Department appropriation bill may go on.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for a short statement in relation to the matter suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would rather not yield for that purpose if it shall provoke any discussion, but I will yield to the Senator from Montana in order that he may make a statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I trust the Senate will disagree to the motion which has been made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the Senate recede from amendment No. 39. That amendment, as I have heretofore explained, authorizes the Secretary of the Interior at his sweet will to condemn any lands held in private ownership in the national parks. I merely desire to advise the Senate at this time that all manner of suggestions for an adjustment of this controversy have been made with the approval of the Park Service. In the first place, inasmuch as the Senators from California have offered no objection, I suggested that it would be entirely satisfactory to me if that provision were made applicable to the Yosemite Park. That would take care of the trees in Yosemite Park concerning which the country has been circularized. That was unsatisfactory.

I then proposed that the provision be made applicable to lands chiefly valuable for timber in any of the public parks, including the Glacier Park. That was unacceptable. The Director of the Park Service then proposed that the condemnation provision be made applicable to all lands in any of the parks except those lands occupied as homes; and that seems to have been unacceptable. So that all question of the preservation of the trees in the Yosemite Park or the trees in any park is entirely out of the controversy. It is simply a question now as to whether the Secretary of the Interior shall be given power to go in and take the homes of two dozen settlers in Glacier National Park and the homes of other people who have acquired homes there before the park was created.

I trust, Mr. President—and I acknowledge the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana—that the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Senate recede from amendment numbered 39 will not be agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF SALT CREEK OIL LEASES

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, last Friday the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] discussed the report, written and prepared by himself, presumably, on the question of the Salt Creek investigation. I had expected to address the Senate on that subject on that day, but because the hour was late I postponed anything I might have to say until the next day. Then, because the unfinished business was before the Senate with a limitation on debate to go into effect at 4 o'clock, I did not proceed; nor did I get an opportunity on Monday or Tuesday to discuss the question. So I shall now undertake to say something about what was discussed at that time and on the general subject of Salt Creek.

Mr. President, on the 30th day of April, 1928, the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was authorized and directed by the Norris resolution to—> make a full and complete investigation as to the occupation, leasing of, and contracts for oil and oil lands in the Salt Creek field in the State of Wyoming, and any other adjacent Government oil lands.

The resolution in some detail states rather specifically what the committee is expected to do. It is to investigate—

> (a) "Whether said occupation, leases, or contracts * * * were illegal or fraudulent," and (b) "whether the assigning * * * or the operation under said leases or contracts has given to any individual, agency, association, partnership, or corporation a monopoly" or "has tended toward * * * any monopoly in the production or distribution of oil," and to report to the Senate (a) "whether said occupation, leases, or contracts * * * are illegal or fraudulent and * * * should be annulled * * * by the United States" and (b) "what, if any, legislation should be enacted by Congress" to cure the evils disclosed by the investigation authorized.

Every Member of the Senate knows that the resolution contemplated a thorough investigation of the freely alleged irregularities connected with the wholesale leasing of the Salt Creek field in 1920 and early in 1921.

Subsequently, the committee held hearings and witnesses were examined.

In December, 1922, Albert B. Fall, then Secretary of the Interior, entered into a contract with the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. for the sale of the royalty oil accruing to the Government from leases within the Salt Creek field for a period of five years, beginning January 1, 1923.

The contract contained a clause giving the purchaser the option of renewing the contract at its expiration for an additional five years, providing proper notice was given the Government.

In accordance with this clause, and after notice was seasonably given, Hubert Work, Secretary of the Interior, on the 20th day of February, 1928, executed a renewal contract.

This was but little more than two months prior to the adoption of the Norris resolution in the Senate.

On February 7, 1929, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] offered to the Senate a report on the investigation conducted, with a resolution of his own, asking that the report be adopted as the judgment of the Senate.

Under all the circumstances, this is a strange report, and speaking of it one might almost borrow the words of the celebrated character who said, "Thou comest in such questionable shape."

First of all, it completely ignores the exceedingly grave matters which the committee was directed to investigate. Not a word with reference to the inexcusable looting of Salt Creek field, as a result of which it is estimated the Government has lost a billion dollars or more.

In the next place it is a minority report, expressing views only of a minority of the committee, and this minority composed only of Democrats.

It has all the appearance of being a partisan report, presented for partisan purposes, and ends by severely censuring executive departments of a Republican administration.

So far as the facts are stated, they are substantially correct, but on the other hand, many additional facts are glossed over, or omitted entirely.

The conclusions drawn are in my judgment thoroughly erroneous.

It appears from the record that Secretary Work in renewing the contract was supported unanimously by his advisors in the department.

The solicitor of the department, Mr. E. O. Patterson; Mr. Newman, of the departmental board of appeals; the assistant secretary, E. C. Finney; George Otis Smith, Director of the Geological Survey, and nine members of the force of the Geological Survey and the General Land Office, all agreed on the legal proposition, that under the renewal clause of the original contract, the Government was bound to execute the new contract.

These facts are absolutely undisputed by the record.

It is true that protests had been lodged against renewal, but upon invitation to show how the Government could avoid the contract, the objectors failed completely to advance any method by which renewal could be legally escaped.

Even the learned Senator from Montana was in agreement with the Interior Department on this question, for on the 17th day of February, 1928, three days before the contract was executed, in a letter to a correspondent in New York, he said among other things:

> I regret to say that I am obliged to agree with the Secretary that he is legally bound to renew.

It must be assumed that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was more or less familiar with this option clause at that time, for he had had much correspondence concerning a very similar contract covering a period of several years.

At practically the same time the Sinclair contract was entered into in 1922 Secretary Fall executed an agreement with the Lewistown Oil & Refining Co. for the sale of Cat Creek oil. This contract also contained a renewal clause, and under that clause was renewed in 1928.

The senior Senator from Montana interested himself considerably in that matter, for the purchasers were constituents from his State.

Chronological record of the correspondence follows:

CAT CREEK CONTRACT

February 11, 1922: Rockwood Brown to Senator T. J. WALSH, advising that Montana Refining Co. has recently erected a refinery at Billings, Mont., and that it desires to secure a supply of oil from the Cat Creek field.

February 16, 1922: Senator T. J. WALSH to Secretary Fall, inclosing letter from Hon. Rockwood Brown, Billings, Mont., asking for reply.

March 11, 1922: Rockwood Brown to Senator T. J. WALSH relative to securing crude oil in the Cat Creek field.

March 16, 1922: Senator T. J. WALSH to Secretary Fall, referring to previous letter of February 16, and asking him to give consideration to the letter of Brown of March 11, 1922.

March 22, 1922: Letter from First Assistant Secretary Finney to Senator T. J. WALSH, referring to letter of March 11 from Rockwood Brown, advising Senator WALSH that the whole matter is under consideration by the Secretary and that he will be further advised.

March 25, 1922: Letter to Senator T. J. WALSH from First Assistant Secretary Finney, transmitting copy of telegram of March 25 to Rockwood Brown.

January 22, 1923: From Senator T. J. WALSH to Secretary Fall, requesting that copy of contract between the Lewistown Oil & Refining Co. and the United States be sent him.

January 27, 1923: Letter to Senator T. J. WALSH by Secretary Fall, complying with request for copy of contract.

February 17, 1923: Secretary Fall to Senator T. J. WALSH, calling attention to the letter of contract for the sale of Cat Creek oil to the Lewistown Oil & Refining Co. and of his interest in the contract, and that he had been "courteous enough to counsel me in the disposition of that oil in an effort to secure the greatest revenue from it."

March 3, 1924: Secretary Work to S. C. Palmer, United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, inclosing copies of contracts for sale of royalty oil in Salt Creek and Cat Creek fields.

January 17, 1927: Senator T. J. WALSH to Secretary Work, asking for construction of the option clause in Cat Creek contract.

January 26, 1927: Secretary Work to Senator T. J. WALSH, advising of the opinion of the department that Lewistown Oil & Refining Co. would be entitled to a renewal.

February 9, 1928: Recommendation of Thomas C. Havell, Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office, and W. C. Mendenhall, Acting Director of the Geological Survey, for approval of renewal of Cat Creek contract.

March 24, 1928, renewal approved by Edward C. Finney, First Assistant Secretary of Interior.

October 17, 1928: First Assistant Secretary to the Director of the Geological Survey, directing examination of contract Lewistown Oil & Refining Co. pertaining to Government royalty oils in Cat Creek, and accompanying papers, and submission to the department, through the office of the solicitor, with recommendation and statement of facts as the record may justify in the light of the Attorney General's opinion in the Salt Creek case.

October 22, 1928: Solicitor Patterson to First Assistant Secretary, opinion holding Lewistown Oil & Refining Co. contract exactly same status as Salt Creek.

October 22, 1928: Secretary of the Interior to Attorney General, transmitting memorandum opinion of solicitor and copy of contract in the Lewistown Oil & Refining Co. matter, and requesting opinion.

The record further shows that the Secretary of the Interior forwarded a copy of the Sinclair contract to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, and a copy also to Messrs. Pomerene and Roberts, counsel for the Government in the naval oil reserve matters.

Early in April, 1928, the White Eagle Oil & Refining Co., a competitor of the Sinclair Co., protested to the Department of the Interior against the renewal contract that had been entered. The protest was referred to the solicitor of the department, who prepared an opinion upholding the contract.

Upon receiving the solicitor's opinion, the protest, with explanations, was referred by the Assistant Secretary to the Department of Justice for opinion.

Col. William J. Donovan, Assistant to the Attorney General, ordered Messrs. Kenyon and Chandler, of the department, to investigate the matter. Those attorneys conferred with the Senator from Montana regarding it, by arrangement made by Colonel Donovan with the Senator.

Upon investigation it appears from the record that attorneys in the Department of Justice were in accord with the Department of the Interior on the questions of law involved.

Subsequently, however, James P. Kem, counsel for the White Eagle Co., was able to convince Colonel Donovan that a different theory of law obtained and that the contract could and should be annulled.

The record shows that in October, 1928, Mr. Kem called on the Senator from Montana, at Helena, and succeeded in causing him also to change his views, just as other Government officials had changed theirs.

Whereupon the Senator from Montana felt called upon to take the matter hurriedly to the New York World. This is one of the strangest episodes in the whole matter.

The record shows that Colonel Donovan had tried to enlist the cooperation of the Senator from Montana. As early as March or April he had even arranged for Kenyon and Chandler to confer personally with the Senator, and had every reason to expect the latter's full cooperation in the interest of the Government.

It is easy to imagine his amazement when he learned of the Senator's excursion into the newspapers.

In this connection I quote the following from page 323, part 2, of the hearings before the committee:

Senator WALSH. Do you remember just how this matter of the contract for the Salt Creek royalty oil first came to the department?

Mr. DONOVAN. It first came by letter from the President to the department, and the Attorney General sent for me and asked me to take care of it.

In that letter it was requested I get in touch with you. I did at once. I talked with you about it and asked if you could help me. You said you would do it. I then replied to your letter to Mr. Williams, which you read, and we were of the view then, with that being correct, that there was no technical invalidity, but wondered whether it could be invalidated if we showed fraud. You expressed doubt as to whether we could do that. I said that might well be, but I ought to thresh it out, and I thought there was a further question in it as to whether the Midwest had violated the monopoly provisions of the leasing act; and, if not, if we could get no good basis there, whether or not there had been a violation of the Sherman Act. I asked you if you would see two men that I had selected to handle the case. You said you would. They saw you and you gave them an opinion; aided them. And then there was a hearing by this committee. I came to the committee; I pointed out to it what we had in mind—the difficulties; that we felt we were in control of the business, and we felt that there was a fraud action.

Here was Colonel Donovan doing his utmost to protect the United States Government and frankly stating his plans to the committee.

Without saying a word to the Assistant Attorney General, but immediately upon changing his views as to the legal questions involved, the Senator hastens to the New York World.

Again quoting from the hearings before the committee, pages 343–344, part 2:

Mr. DONOVAN. The only thing—and I say this, Senator, and I say it with no criticism but solely as a matter of record. I will tell you my frank reaction as I read that. I had gone to you and asked for cooperation. You said you would give it to me, and you did give it. You said you would provide us with information. I came to the committee. We agreed upon that cooperation. When this came to Senator NYE, he came to see me; it came to Senator Sterling, and he came to see me; it came to Senator CAPPER, and he called me by telephone. When it came to you, it may be that you felt you did not need to give me that courtesy of calling me up, but it did strike me that it would have been the decent thing if you had done so.

Senator WALSH. I am very glad you spoke about that, Colonel, because I would like to give you my reaction. No word came to me with this particular point that was presented to the Department of the Interior immediately by letter dated April 11, 1928. No one came to me, likewise, that it came to the attention of the Department of Justice as early as the month of June. I now learn that it came to the Department of Justice on April 27, 1928. Hearings were had before the committee charged with the investigation of this particular subject, and Mr. Kenyon and Mr. Chandler attended those hearings, and it was in the month of October, and nobody had even ever suggested to me that such a question was intimated, or given me information concerning any facts, and I rather thought that I had not been treated very courteously by the department.

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, Senator, that could have been easily determined. You could have called up and said, "Donovan, what is the matter with you about this?" That would have been the obvious thing to do with the fellows you were cooperating with.

Senator WALSH. Colonel Donovan, Mr. Kem told me that he tried to get this opinion from the Interior Department and he could not get it. He told me that he went to the Department of Justice and tried to get it and they told him that it was confidential.

Mr. DONOVAN. Which I think Mr. Kenyon was perfectly right in doing; but that does not bear upon the point of your relation and mine, it seems, Senator. I think that in view of what our arrangement had been, that rather than prejudge, you would have ascertained what the real facts were. I am just telling you what my reaction was.

Senator WALSH. And I am telling you what mine was.

The able and exhaustive opinion of Mr. Kenyon was presented to Colonel Donovan on October 8. The latter concurred in the opinion, it was redrafted in substantially the same form, and was ready for the Attorney General's signature on October 15.

On that day the New York World carried the matter, furnished by the senior Senator from Montana.

How refreshing is the naïveté of the learned Senator on this point.

Quoting from his own report, page 12:

He [Senator WALSH] interested the New York World in the affair, and that journal on Monday, October 15, published a story of the affair with an interview with Kem and Senators CAPPER and WALSH, the opinion of the latter, mentioned above, being a feature of the article so published.

How different was the opinion of the Senator, which featured this article, from the opinion he had given his correspondent in New York on the same subject matter back in February.

And, again, how delightfully nonpartisan the Senator appears, hurrying with his new-formed opinion to that staunch old Democratic newspaper, in the midst of a presidential campaign, with the election only three weeks away.

Why, in common decency, did not the Senator communicate at once with Colonel Donovan, who had every reason to believe that he was entitled to and would receive his cooperation?

As a direct result of the Attorney General's opinion, the Sinclair contract was canceled as was also the Cat Creek agreement.

Litigation is pending, instituted by Colonel Donovan, and there is every reason to assume that the Government will, in the end, not lose a single cent.

The learned Senator from Montana, in his report, deals in captious criticism of practically everybody connected with two of the great executive departments.

Government, in the final analysis, is conducted by human beings, and no one is perfect.

Down across the centuries have come the words from the lips of the only perfect Man: "Be ye also perfect," but throughout the years, men and women, too, in their endeavors to live up to that high precept, have met with only varying degrees of success.

Perhaps the Senator from Montana has reached the heights and feels impelled to admonish his fellows in the same exalted language.

Certain it is that he can find only the grossest imperfection in the United States Government as it is conducted by human beings of the Republican Party.

In his remarkable report he shows his utter contempt for many of those in the departments, and uses this language:

> Some of them lawyers, some not, the lawyers getting the munificent salary of from $2,000 to $3,000 a year.

He seems to lose sight of the fact that many good men and women, too, are willing to sacrifice something in money that they might render service to the country they love. The Senator himself has in the past given some indication that he may be inspired by kindred feelings.

On April 5, 1928, speaking on this floor, he said:

> If I should be thus employed and should succeed as well as was the case here, the court would probably make allowance for attorney's fees that would make me richer than I ever expected to be or hoped to be or desired to be, but I have been very much more amply repaid by, as I think, the gratitude of the American people.

That is doubtless true. The Senator deserves the gratitude of the people for all the good he has done, and if he has no imperfections it is all good. I seem to remember, however, that last year the learned Senator offered himself as a candidate for President in two typical Western States, California and Oregon, and even the members of his own party proved themselves so ungrateful that the Senator found it advisable to retire from the race.

This he may charge to the ingratitude that is said to characterize republics.

The record shows conclusively that both the Department of the Interior and that of Justice have labored earnestly and faithfully to protect the interests of the country.

Yet the report of the Senator from Montana severely criticizes officials in those departments, and while I can not believe the United States Senate would ever adopt the report, the language made public therein tends in itself to hold up to ridicule and disgrace such men as Doctor Work, Attorney General Sargent, and Colonel Donovan.

Who are these men that have been so freely criticized and censured by the Senator from Montana?

I have taken occasion to find out something about them.

Hubert Work is a physician in private life, First Assistant Postmaster General and Postmaster General under the late President Harding, and Secretary of the Interior under President Coolidge.

Secretary Work was born and reared on a farm in Indiana County, Pa. He attended the public schools and the Indiana (Pa.) State Normal School, continuing to work on the farm during the summer vacations. He matriculated in the University of Michigan medical department; two years later he entered the University of Pennsylvania and was graduated the following year as doctor of medicine.

Secretary Work then went West and began the practice of medicine at Fort Morgan, Colo. He later settled at Pueblo, Colo., where he founded, owned, and operated for 20 years the Woodcroft Hospital for mental and nervous diseases; then entered the Army Medical Corps. Commissioned a major, he was assigned by Surgeon General Gorgas to the staff of Provost Marshal General Crowder, where he served as liaison officer between these two branches with direct supervision of the medical features of the draft. He was promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel and later advanced to the grade of colonel in the Reserve Medical Corps.

During his professional career extending over a period of 32 years, Secretary Work served at various times as president of the Colorado State Medical Society; member of the Colorado State Board of Health; president of the American Medico-Psychological Society; and president of the American Medical Association.

A staunch and lifelong Republican, Secretary Work has been active in his party organization both State and national. He was a delegate at large from Colorado to the Republican National Convention in 1908; chairman of the Colorado Republican State central committee in 1912; Republican national committeeman for Colorado from 1913 to 1919; at present chairman Republican National Committee.

The service of Doctor Work during more than five years as Secretary of the Interior was distinguished by a businesslike administration and a tireless attention to the details of that exacting office.

Doctor Work expressed his ideals of Government service in his annual report for the fiscal year 1925, as follows:

> The Government is an impersonal employer. There is no mentor for official acts except public opinion, no safeguard against errors of judgment except detail knowledge, and no rewards except conscience. * * * The temptation is great to purchase official popularity through complaisance in the expenditure of public funds. The Government administrator who promises, trusting to time or circumstances to relieve him of the obligation, gains immediate applause, but he speculates with his integrity of purpose.
> Government service should be regarded as an ethical profession. It should not enlist those ambitious to acquire wealth. Its material compensation is fixed by statute, but its lasting rewards come through the spirit of service.
> The administrators of the Interior Department's affairs are trustees of public and trust funds. Their moral obligations are limited only by their number and measured by their magnitude. (P. 1, Annual Report of the Secretary of the Interior, 1925.)

The Department of the Interior is concerned primarily with the conservation of the natural resources of the United States. Of the 12 bureaus and offices in the department the majority of them are charged under the law with functions connected with the disposal, development, conservation, and administration of the public domain. There are approximately 13,000 permanent employees in 40 States and Territories and an additional temporary force numbering about 5,000 employees during the summer season. Appropriations for conducting the department are about $300,000,000 annually.

The successive annual reports presented to Congress by Secretary Work show a systematic reorganization of the department under his direction, with painstaking attention to detail unusual in the directing head of a great department of the Government. His services represent to the taxpayers a saving of more than $131,000,000 in the operating expenditures of the department.

What about the Attorney General?

Hon. John G. Sargent, of Vermont, was graduated from Tufts College with an A. B. degree in 1887; received his A. M. in 1912; was State's attorney of Windsor County, Vt., from 1898–1900; secretary civil and military affairs of Vermont from 1900–1902; attorney general of Vermont from 1908–1912; trustee of the Black River Academy; member of the American Bar Association, Vermont State Bar Association, Windsor County Bar Association, the Vermont Historical Society, and chairman of the Vermont Commission on Uniform State Laws. He was appointed Attorney General of the United States March 17, 1925, and from then until now he has served the country well and worthily.

But the Senator from Montana especially criticizes Colonel Donovan, notwithstanding his splendid record of public service. I have looked a little into his accomplishments.

William Joseph Donovan was born at Buffalo, N. Y., on January 1, 1883. From Columbia University he received the degree of bachelor of arts in 1905 and the degree of bachelor of laws in 1907. He took a very active interest in athletics during all of his school life.

In 1916 he went to Poland with the American Relief Commission, which was sent abroad to give relief to the starving people of Europe. He came back to serve on the Mexican border with Troop I, New York Cavalry, of which troop he was captain.

At the outbreak of the war he was assigned to the Twenty-seventh Division. When the One hundred and sixty-fifth Infantry—old Sixty-ninth New York—was ordered overseas Donovan asked to be assigned to that regiment, of which he later became lieutenant colonel and then colonel. During his service overseas he was wounded three times and received the distinguished-service cross, the distinguished-service medal, the congressional medal, the Legion of Honor, croix de guerre star and palm.

In 1919 he went to Siberia with Ambassador Roland Morris, at Tokio, on the mission to investigate the Kolchak government.

In 1922 he served as counsel to the New York State Fuel Administration and also served as a member of the diplomatic delegation representing the United States in the international conference between the United States and Canada relative to customs regulations.

On February 7, 1922, he was appointed the United States attorney for the western district of New York, in which office he served until August 14, 1924, when President Coolidge appointed him Assistant Attorney General in charge of criminal matters. This office he held until March, 1925, when he became the Assistant to the Attorney General. In addition to his other duties he has charge of the antitrust division of the Department of Justice, and as such directs all activities of the department against combinations of whatsoever kind in restraint of trade.

Such are the public officials the Senator from Montana would ask the Senate to censure and disgrace forever.

But I have too much faith in the sense of justice and fair play that prevail in this body to believe any such action could be taken.

Mr. President, allow me now to touch on another phase of this subject. The amazing thing about the report is its utter silence with reference to the matters the committee was directed to investigate.

So superficial is this report that one is led to wonder whether or not it is meant to be a smoke screen to divert attention from the real rottenness of the Salt Creek mess.

I undertake to say that the Government has been defrauded out of hundreds of millions of dollars in the Salt Creek region, that the rottenness can be uncovered and much of the property reclaimed.

Why has the learned Senator from Montana not given us a report on this very vital question?

On the 18th of January, 1921, Robert C. Bell, a special assistant to the Attorney General in the last Democratic administration, submitted to the Department of the Interior and to the Attorney General of the United States a memorandum with reference to the leasing of the Salt Creek field.

The memorandum was carefully prepared after many months of most painstaking investigation.

It purported to show colossal fraud in the leases and wholesale and illegal wildcatting as a result of which this area passed into the hands of private exploiters unlawfully.

Salt Creek is unquestionably the richest oil field in the world.

Mr. Bell had been with the Department of Justice for several years and gave it as his opinion that the Government could and should regain possession of this field.

No heed was given to the pleading of Mr. Bell, however, and under the leasing act of 1920, sponsored by the Senator from Montana, the leases asked for by the alleged exploiters were allowed by the Government, and this great inheritance was lost to the American people.

An excerpt from the Bell report reads as follows:

> Iba used the names of more than 100 persons from whom he obtained powers of attorney containing the above-mentioned provision, before the locations were made. None of his colocators ever claimed any interest or received any benefits or profits.
> Certain of the above-named applicants before they had settled their differences and joined in their common cause against the United States, alleged and contended, in a number of "adverse" proceedings in the district court of Natrona County, Wyo., that the Iba locations were void and unlawful, because the locators were dummies and the locations were entirely abandoned long prior to the order of withdrawal. Surely these same applicants will not now be permitted to avail themselves of the claims that they once contended were so bad.
> The question naturally presenting itself is why were so many locations made, and why were they invariably bad? The reason is simple. Some ambitious individual who had acquired some knowledge of the oil business would hear something about the prospects for oil at Salt Creek. Such an individual, of course, was not content with one location of 20 acres, or a number of locations in which he had an interest of only 20 acres, so he would borrow the names of his friends and relatives and proceed to locate for his own use and benefit vast areas of the public lands. Generally no pretense was made at complying with the law in any respect, except to make the "paper" locations so as to acquire a color of title which might be sold at a profit to some real oil operator or promoter.
> For several years delegations appeared before Congressmen, Senators, and other officials beseeching "relief" for the poor, honest, oppressed prospectors, who were much discussed, but in truth unknown to the history of the Salt Creek field. If such ever existed, they have long since, at the behest of the Midwest interests, vi et armis or otherwise, passed on.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. How long ago was that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. How long ago was what?

Mr. WHEELER. When the conspiracy took place that the Senator has narrated?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It was years ago. It went on through a number of years, according to the Bell report, which is in the possession of the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. In my possession?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It should be, because I inserted it in the RECORD something like a year ago; and immediately following the conclusion of my remarks to-day I shall insert it in the RECORD again.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not in my possession.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I assumed the Senator had the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in his possession.

Mr. WHEELER. It may be some place in the RECORD, but it is not in my possession. What I want to ask the Senator is why the present Attorney General, knowing such a conspiracy existed, has not during the past eight years done anything to prosecute these men for conspiracy to violate the law?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Department of Justice has been going into this matter all the time and is continuing to do so. There has been a Senate committee going into these oil matters almost constantly, and all they could see was Teapot Dome and Elk Hills, which are tiny in comparison to the fraud and corruption connected with the Salt Creek field.

Mr. WHEELER. But there has been an Attorney General who had something to do besides Teapot Dome, because he did not do anything with reference to that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, yes; much has been done with which perhaps the Senator is not familiar.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And more is going to be done, and in my opinion all of the rottenness and corruption connected with the Salt Creek field will be uncovered and the Department of Justice will recover these valuable properties for the United States Government.

Mr. WHEELER. I am very glad to hear that the Department of Justice is actually going to do something, but I am pointing out the fact that we have had a Republican Attorney General for eight years and he has not done anything about it, notwithstanding the fact that the Senator from Indiana, as he said, placed in the RECORD a complete report showing all of the facts of corruption and crookedness.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Immediately after placing the report in the RECORD, as I stated, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered his resolution directing that the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys inquire into the whole Salt Creek matter and make a thorough investigation, and presumably that is what they have been doing. I mean to show that the committee has not scratched the surface; that the committee should continue going into that matter; that its investigation should be carried into the next Congress; that it would be unthinkable to let the investigation lapse with this Congress. I am going to say something more pointed on that subject in a few moments even though some members of the committee may think the criticism is directed at them personally.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator will yield again, I do not quite understand yet. Does the Senator mean to say that his friend, Mr. Donovan, and the Department of Justice have not done anything in this matter because——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, no; I do not say that. I said much had been done of which the Senator evidently is ignorant, judging from what he said here a moment ago. If he will go into the record he will find a tremendous lot of work has been done in that connection, but we still have not scratched the surface of the rottenness connected with the latter part of the Wilson administration, into which we propose to go. It was left to us as an inheritance. It was hard to dig out because many of the corrupt features of the matter were so carefully buried and therefore were difficult to get at. It takes time to do it, but we propose to do it.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator mean to say that John Barton Payne had any part in this conspiracy of corruption?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the Senator will read what I have had to say about the matter——

Mr. WHEELER. I am asking the Senator now. Does he not want to answer my question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Of course I am going to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. WHEELER. Why not answer it and not avoid it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will answer the Senator's question in this way: John Barton Payne came in during the latter part of the last Democratic administration. He was in office almost a year, approximately a year at any rate, and during that year the entire Salt Creek field was given away or leased away, and there is where the corruption lies.

Mr. WHEELER. Then am I to understand the Senator to say that he thinks John Barton Payne was corrupt when he gave this field away?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would not go to the extent of saying that John Barton Payne was corrupt. I am a little more careful in my choice of language than some Members on the other side of the Chamber have been in connection with this investigation. I will say that it is the function of the committee to find out whether he was or not, and I hope they will investigate carefully, and if he was, then he will deserve the same fate that was meted out to Mr. Fall—disgrace forever.

Mr. WHEELER. But why is it that it should be necessary to have a committee of Congress to do it when we have a great Department of Justice that ought to be doing this very thing?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then the Senator would like to have the committee cease functioning?

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all. I would like to have it continue, because I think we have an incompetent Department of Justice, and that is the reason why I want the committee to go on. I am simply saying to the Senator that he can not excuse the Department of Justice for what he says has taken place or has not taken place.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. How does the Senator account for the fact that A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General at the end of the Wilson administration, refused absolutely to prosecute these matters when his own assistant, Bell, had brought the report to him showing conclusively there was fraud and corruption throughout the Salt Creek field? Why did the Department of Justice, as it was then being conducted in that administration, refuse absolutely to prosecute the matter?

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator never knew me on this floor or any place else to hold any brief for A. Mitchell Palmer. What excuse is there, if what the Senator said is true and these reports have been in the Department of Justice, for the present Attorney General and the Attorneys General during the last eight years for not taking up the matter and prosecuting it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have just told the Senator from Montana that it will be done, and, perhaps, in language too strong to suit the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I hope the Senator will be pleased with what will be done, and will be pleased with those who may be branded in the end.

Mr. WHEELER. I will be pleased with the branding of any of them whether they are Democrats or Republicans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Exactly. That is what we propose to do. Let the guilty be brought to justice whether they be Democrats or Republicans. What difference does it make? That is what we propose to do.

Mr. WHEELER. I am trying to get the Senator to tell me why it has not been done during the past eight years.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is not that the same question I have answered three or four times?

Mr. WHEELER. I have not heard the Senator answer it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not like to refer any further to the Senator's ignorance of the matter. If he will consult the records of the Department of Justice, he will find out that much has been done. That is the fact. The Senator does not want a detailed statement from me of just what has been done, does he?

Mr. WHEELER. For eight years they have been doing much about it, the Senator says?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Exactly; and will do more.

Mr. WHEELER. And yet they have not filed one single case in court with reference to it nor have they indicted anybody at all, have they?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the Senator be satisfied when he hears of the indictments, if they do come?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course. If there is anybody who has done anything that is corrupt or crooked in the matter, I will be delighted to know that they have been indicted. But the Senator now is criticizing Mr. Palmer because he did not do anything, and has said that he had these facts before him; but during the past eight years we have had a Republican administration and nothing has been done under that administration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think it will all be done.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, we know that when we investigated the Daugherty case, whenever we brought in anything else we were constantly told, "Mr. Daugherty is going to do it," but he never got around to doing it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. When the Senator brings in the Daugherty matter, let me remind him that the only matters which were investigated at all were Teapot Dome and Elk Hills, naval leases Nos. 1, 2, and 3. The Salt Creek field was scarcely touched. Teapot Dome and Elk Hills are mole hills in comparison with the mountain of Salt Creek. Teapot Dome was little in value compared with Salt Creek. But if there was a little graft in Teapot Dome, if several millions or hundreds of millions of dollars can be characterized as "little graft," then in Salt Creek there was tremendous graft, and it should have been brought out by this same committee during these years.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator tells us there was only a little graft.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I did not say only a little graft. I made a comparative statement. I said if there were graft connected with Teapot Dome and Elk Hills, then by comparison the graft connected with Salt Creek field was tremendously greater. I am violently opposed to graft anywhere, whether it be big or little.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator tell us now and point out just which official of the Government grafted in connection with the Salt Creek field?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am hoping we will get to that very point.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, but the Senator said there was big graft. Who was it that grafted? What official of the Wilson administration was it that grafted?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think that will be gone into very fully.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; but the Senator has made the statement. When we made any statement with reference to graft in the Daugherty administration and in the Fall administration we did not say it was graft until we had the facts and brought them to the Senate. Will the Senator tell me a single official that took any graft under Wilson?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I can tell the Senator a number of officials that took oil employment—many members of the force of the Interior Department and even executive heads of the department.

Mr. WHEELER. Tell us the name of one single, solitary Democratic official that took any money.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is asking a question which, of course, I would not attempt to answer. It is a matter that must be referred to a grand jury and to the courts of justice. It would not be becoming for me to stand here and attempt to say that any member of the Wilson administration who is not even on trial was a criminal. Of course, I shall not do that; but I do say, Mr. President, that there is evidence of corruption throughout these leases covering a period of years, not only in 1920 and 1921 but previous to that time and going back as far, perhaps, as 20 years. I say it is the province of the committee to go into that whole matter; dig it out and let the American people know where the graft and corruption are if they are there. Then let a grand jury do its work on indictments for fraud and corruption and let the guilty suffer.

I shall not attempt to state that some certain person is a criminal. I am objecting to the report of the Senator from Montana, and one of the reasons I am objecting to it is because he would disgrace men who have not done exactly as he would like to have them do in great executive departments of the Government, and he would place the censure of the United States Senate behind that criticism of his against the honor and integrity of these men. I say it is not the province of the Senate or of any Member of the Senate to designate some official as a criminal or as a crook until he has been convicted, because under our theory every man is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not care to yield further to the Senator on that question. I think I have answered it completely, and I can not yield at this time.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator refuses to yield to me. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I can not yield at this time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I will not yield any further at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana refuses to yield.

KNOWLEDGE OF FRAUD

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President—

The contracts above mentioned, between Henshaw and Fitzhugh, were on record in Natrona County, Wyo., wherein the Salt Creek field is situated; therefore, every applicant basing a claim on the Henshaw-Fitzhugh locations had notice of their contents, and consequently of their fraudulent character. The Iba powers of attorney likewise were of record. Moreover, the applicants had actual knowledge of the fraud, by and through the knowledge, acts, and conduct of their incorporators, officers, and agents.

That Salt Creek had been unlawfully exploited and monopolized was commonly asserted on all sides, so on April 16, 1928, I had the Bell report inserted in the RECORD.

Subsequent thereto, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered his resolution, which was duly adopted, and under color of which the Senator from Montana brings forward his remarkable report, which ignores completely the grave questions at issue, and has the practical effect of diverting attention from the fraudulent Salt Creek leases that mean hundreds of millions of dollars to the American people.

In the meantime, the Rocky Mountain News, of Denver, Colo., published an editorial on March 31 which I desire to read.

I invite the attention especially of the junior Senator from Montana to this editorial.

Mr. WHEELER. Is the owner of that newspaper the same man who took money in the Teapot Dome case?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I shall not yield. I want to read this editorial to the Senator for his benefit. The editorial was published on March 31 last in the Rocky Mountain News, of Denver, Colo.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator ought to identify the owner of the paper, and say whether he is the man who took money in the Teapot Dome case.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I must decline to yield. I should like to show the Senator every courtesy, but I hope he will not interrupt me unless I give him permission to do so. I do want him to listen to this editorial, not to talk. The editorial bears the headline:

Salt Creek's bitter oil.

Mr. WHEELER. What editorial is that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is an editorial from the Rocky Mountain News, of Denver, Colo., a newspaper which is published right in the midst of where the transactions took place and where people know all about them. It is one of the Scripps-Howard chain of newspapers. As I have said, the editorial was published on March 31 last, and reads:

Keep Teapot Dome and Elk Hills in their class and finish with them——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. When I finish reading this editorial I will yield to the senior Senator from Montana. I will read the entire editorial.

SALT CREEK'S BITTER OIL

Keep Teapot Dome and Elk Hills in their class and finish with them and expose all the rottenness.

But do not stop there. Give Salt Creek, Wyo., the thrice over.

Acre for acre, the Salt Creek field has been the richest find on the continent. It has been producing actively 16 years, and there are a good many years ahead of it. Actually billions in it.

The greater part of its public-land sections was traded off during the Democratic national régime of 1913–1921, but more particularly during the last year or two of the Wilson administration, when the big man was absent or physically unable to check on things.

Go back to the discovery of the rich field. It becomes an international story. Some comedy and romance; but, above all, tragedy. The tragic is showing up now. The romance and the comedy are all gone; the Greek climax is nearing.

Find out all about the preemptors of Salt Creek and what became of them. Several of them victims of mercenaries, one or two with millions which they did not know what to do with, poor fellows!

Learn something of the means taken to be rid of homesteaders and prospectors—a fierce tale in itself.

Find out a whole lot about the passage of the leasing act—a novel in its plots and counterplots.

The intent was good; the result was ignoble.

Find out regarding the limited number of owners and lessees now in the field and in what way they gained possession. A 3-volumed novel.

Beyond everything else, let the investigators dig deep into the "highjacking" propositions practiced over the Salt Creek field. This we guarantee will cause the ears of the Nation to prick up. It will be a story of stories. Neither the Teapot Dome nor the California hold-up will compare with it. Millions in blackmail!

Or should it be told?

As a lesson in national morality, we believe the whole scandal should be uncovered—"given the air!"

That is more, Mr. President, than I myself have charged in all that has gone on in connection with this discussion. Now I yield to the senior Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I merely rose to say that this is the first information I have had that the Rocky Mountain News is a Scripps-Howard newspaper.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is my understanding. I may be wrong about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When the Teapot Dome investigation was in progress it was developed that it was owned by one Shaffer, who owns a chain of newspapers in the State of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am informed that it is a Scripps-Howard paper, and I think I am right about that; but the Senator may have some information that I do not have.

Mr. WHEELER. If it is a Scripps-Howard paper, it was acquired by the Scripps-Howard interests recently, during the last year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, Mr. Bell is an exceedingly able lawyer, experienced, courageous, energetic, and thoroughly familiar with the whole history of Salt Creek.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will yield to the Senator in a moment or two.

When the Norris resolution was adopted, I supposed, of course, that the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys would engage Mr. Bell as counsel.

Considering all the circumstances, where could a more valuable man be found?

Instead, however, the committee selected Hon. Thomas Sterling, a former Member of this body.

I have no intention of criticizing the committee for its selection, nor Senator Sterling for accepting the employment. So far as I know he is a man of ability and integrity.

I think it is fair to observe, however, that he is well advanced in years, and has no knowledge specially qualifying him for this gigantic task.

That he has done his best is a fair assumption, but the surface has not been scratched as yet, and it is unthinkable to let this investigation lapse with the passing of this Congress.

It is true that Mr. Bell was summoned before the committee and that his evidence was heard, but on going over the record, one must be surprised at the manner in which it was treated.

For instance, I shall quote from page 242, part 1, of the hearings.

I am now going to read from the evidence given in the hearings, and if the Senator from Montana cares to ask me a question before I proceed to do so, I shall yield to him.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to ask the Senator if Mr. Bell, or if the Senator, for Mr. Bell, ever showed the report of Bell's to the Department of Justice?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I never have done so, Mr. President.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator never had done so. Does he know whether Mr. Bell ever called it to the attention of the department?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not certain of that. After he went out of the Democratic administration, I am not certain whether or not he ever brought it to the attention of the successors of the Democratic administration.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does not know as to that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think I can answer the question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I, myself, can not say as to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Bell's report was on file in the Department of Justice. Some years ago I asked for a copy of it and the officials said the report was not there, but I persisted and finally they found it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then, it was there?

Mr. WHEELER. In view of the fact, as I said before, that the report, which the Senator says is absolutely correct, was there, I am curious to know why it was that they did not act upon it, and whether the Senator thinks it is absolutely necessary for the committee to proceed and bring out these facts in order to force the hand of the Department of Justice.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is precisely the same question the Senator has asked time and time again.

Mr. WHEELER. But the Senator has not answered it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have answered it. I have told the Senator that much has been done of which he apparently is ignorant, but which he can learn about if he will take the time to do so, and that much more will be done, in my opinion. However, Mr. President, I really do not care to take my time or the time of the Senate to continue with that question any longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, I will not press the question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator can speak on that question. If he desires to criticize, he is perfectly within his right.

Mr. President, I wish to discuss now some of the evidence that was taken before the committee recently, in order to show the Senate and the country the manner in which Mr. Bell was treated before the committee by those who examined him. For instance, from page 242, part 1, of the hearings, I quote the following:

Senator WALSH. Well, at that time the bills which evidently became the leasing act of 1920 were pending before the Congress and hearings being had?

Mr. BELL. I do not remember exactly as to that; hearings were being held, I think about that time.

Senator WALSH. Well, was not the situation this, that Attorney General Palmer took the position that the matter ought to remain in abeyance to await action by Congress? At least that is what was done.

Mr. BELL. That was what was done. I won't pretend to say what the whole purpose behind it all was.

Senator WALSH. You spoke about your information about the matter, Mr. Bell.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Senator WALSH. And I asked you what you knew about it. Now, from what source did your information come?

Mr. BELL. I would say from the officials of the Department of Justice. I did not talk to Attorney General Palmer about it, and, of course, what I stated is hearsay.

Senator WALSH. Yes. Well, now, anyway, you did not file the bills. I would like to know where you got your information which really, apparently, suspended your operations on the matter, where your directions came from.

Mr. BELL. From the Department of Justice. I would not say direct from Mr. Palmer; perhaps from an Assistant Attorney General in the public lands division.

Mr. President, there is no mention of this in the report of the Senator from Montana, although the witness states plainly that he was deterred in his work by the Department of Justice in that administration.

Again, I quote from pages 244 and 245 of the record:

Mr. BELL. That is true; and it was the position of the Attorney General that prevented us from filing the suits.

Senator WALSH. That being so, your work thus being interrupted, was there some hiatus there between that time and the time that you got active in the matter in some other way?

Mr. BELL. Yes; but we continued our work of study and investigation and preparation to conduct that litigation, because we did not know but what we would have to do so in the future.

Senator WALSH. To file the suits?

Mr. BELL. We kept ourselves in readiness to conduct the litigation and to——

Senator WALSH (interposing). When you speak of "we," who was associated with you in that work?

Mr. BELL. Mr. Bouton.

Senator WALSH. Mr. Bell, will you not please go on and tell us about your further connections with the matter?

Mr. BELL. Of course, when these bills were prepared and it became apparent that this litigation was going to be commenced there was very great activity on the part of the claimants to the oil lands to secure the enactment of the leasing law. Our whole work was held in abeyance.

Senator WALSH. Let me interrupt, with reference to that. You speak about their activity in endeavoring to secure the enactment of the leasing law. Do you mean the entire law or the relief provisions of it?

Mr. BELL. I had in mind the entire bill.

Senator WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BELL. Of course, the relief provisions in the bill, Senator, undoubtedly were very largely responsible for the enactment of the leasing law; at least, that is my impression.

Senator WALSH. How did you get that impression?

Mr. BELL. From the records of the hearings before the committee of Congress; the statement of witnesses who appeared, interested parties who appeared.

Senator WALSH. Let us see. Great areas all throughout the West had been withdrawn from entry, because believed to be oil bearing, to await legislation upon that subject, had they not?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Senator WALSH. And were you not aware that all the representatives from the West were desirous of having enacted some legislation which would permit the appropriation of those lands?

Mr. BELL. There were a great number, as I remember, that appeared before the committees of Congress seeking the enactment of the leasing law; but my recollection is a large majority of them were parties who were interested in securing relief under the relief provisions of the act.

Senator WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BELL. A greater number of them were from Denver, Colo., Wyoming, and California.

Senator WALSH. Let us dismiss that for a single moment, now.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Senator WALSH. These people who are endeavoring to vitalize their locations under the placer mining act: Were you unaware of any sentiment or demand for legislation which would unlock these great public lands to development and appropriation?

Mr. BELL. I think there was a purpose for the enactment of the leasing law, and undoubtedly there was some sentiment.

Senator WALSH. Now, in the State of Montana—did you know of any controversies in the State of Montana of this character?

Mr. BELL. I am not familiar with the controversies in Montana. I believe there were very few anyway, Senator.

Senator WALSH. You did not know of any controversies of that character in Montana, did you?

Mr. BELL. I will not say I did.

Senator WALSH. Your attention was not directed to any controversies in Montana?

Mr. BELL. I believe not, Senator.

Senator WALSH. Very well. Do you mean to say there was no sentiment in Montana for the enactment of a law that would permit the appropriation of oil lands in Montana or their development?

Mr. President, I point out to you and to the Senate that these questions were directed by the Senator from Montana to his own witness; to a man who was there, if there for any purpose at all, to assist the committee in uncovering the rottenness of Salt Creek; yet he is cross-examined as if he were completely unfriendly.

Mr. BELL. No; I do not mean to say that at all, Senator. I think there was some.

Senator WALSH. It is quite likely that people in the State of Montana would not come down here where nobody had, up to that time, discovered any oil in Montana.

Mr. BELL. That is perhaps true.

Senator WALSH. Of course, these other people, who had discovered oil and were asking for the relief provisions, were down here in force.

Mr. BELL. They certainly were.

Senator WALSH. Everybody realized that; but I wish you would tell us, Mr. Bell, whether, as you gathered it, these people who were here were interested in the enactment of some legislation dealing with the whole subject of oil lands, or whether they were particularly interested in the relief provisions of the act.

Apparently the whole purpose of this examination, Mr. President, is to justify the leasing act, which has been, it seems to me, the cause of so much of our trouble and our misfortune.

Mr. BELL. Well, I think they were interested in the enactment of a general leasing law; but I think their great interest—that is, the great interest of most of those who appeared—was to secure the relief provisions. That was my impression.

From which it would appear that the Senator from Montana was dealing with his own witness as if he feared he might be unfriendly to the investigation.

On pages 252 and 253 appears the following—more of the same examination:

Senator WALSH. You had always lived in the eastern country?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I am a Missourian. I never lived as far west as Helena, Mont., Senator. I want to say this, though, I do not think it is necessary for me to make a statement here to sustain my position. Most of this evidence I have referred to are matters of record. These contracts between Henshaw and Fitzhugh were on record up in Natrona County, Wyo., and a suit had been tried down in Arizona in courts in which Henshaw and Fitzhugh both testified and, if they are to be believed, these locations were certainly dummy locations.

Senator WALSH. Well, reference is made in your report to that, Mr. Bell, and we were eager to see that testimony, but I think that Judge Payne told us that he did not remember that that had been produced and there was no record of it there.

Let me make this suggestion to you—

This is the senior Senator from Montana, now giving a concrete illustration of what might happen—

Let me make this suggestion to you: When the Klondike discoveries were made in 1898 there was quite a flocking from Montana to Arizona and some enterprising prospector whom we knew well, and whom we trusted, was about to go, and he had not any money and wanted to go, and a half dozen of us would get together and put up the money for him under an arrangement that he was to go up there and locate placer mining claims, put the names of all of us on the claims, do just what he saw fit with them; if he got a chance to sell, why, all well and good. So he would go up there and locate a claim with eight names on it, the gentlemen who assisted him in financing his enterprise, and then he would make a contract with some one to sell the claim, or make a contract by which some one was to have a three-quarters interest in the claim for the purpose of furnishing additional money to work the claim, and he was to have a one-fourth interest, but that one-fourth interest he had, of course, for the benefit of all eight of us. Is it not conceivable that that is what Mr. Fitzhugh did?

Apparently trying to justify Mr. Fitzhugh, Mr. President.

Mr. BELL. That is not my conclusion from the contracts, the testimony, and all the information that I have been able to obtain in connection with these locations.

Senator WALSH. But just now, Mr. Bell, we are simply considering the effect of these contracts to which you have called our attention. Of course, there may be much other evidence that will confirm the other view, and I should think that this testimony given in the Arizona case would be exceedingly important, but at the present time I am calling your attention merely to these particular contracts, which as I understand you, themselves demonstrate the invalidity of these locations.

Mr. BELL. I had the impression when I prepared this memorandum in 1920 that the contracts disclosed the dummy character of the locations beyond any question, because the contract provided that Henshaw should have a three-fourths interest and Fitzhugh a one-fourth interest. Why? Why, because Henshaw was furnishing the money. The contracts certainly disclose that there is no other interest except Henshaw's and Fitzhugh's.

Senator WALSH. Unless, of course—

More of the cross-examination, Mr. President:

Senator WALSH. Unless, of course, they were acting in a representative capacity in making the contract.

Senator PITTMAN. Was there not a suit brought in California in which these silent partners were made a party to the suit?

Mr. BELL. I am not sure as to that.

Senator PITTMAN. Well, it is in this testimony here in which you appeared. Right here it testifies when the suit was brought that they made all of these parties in interest a party to it. It is right in the hearing you sat at.

Mr. BELL. Well, it has been six or seven years ago, Senator, and I do not pretend to remember all the details of what occurred at that hearing. I am giving you my best recollection.

Here the senior Senator from Nevada seems uneasy about the good faith of the witness.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator were not a lawyer, he would be more pardonable; but, of course, I assume that he has had nothing to do with mining law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not hear the Senator. Will he speak louder?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir. I say that the question submitted was whether certain evidence constituted a fraudulent location, known as a dummy location. If evidence was presented to the committee by Mr. Bell or any one else that would lead a lawyer to believe that it was a dummy location, it would be the duty of the members of the committee to vote instantly to request the institution of proceedings to set it aside. The question was whether or not he had any other evidence than the contract of sale.

The contract of sale was subject to interpretation. Those who thought the contract of sale constituted a dummy location would so vote; those who did not would vote the other way; but the evidence that Mr. Bell referred to was as to whether or not these parties had any interest in it other than that of dummy locators.

The Senator from Nevada called attention to a suit in California in which all of these parties were alleged to have an existing interest in those claims, and also appeared and asserted an existing interest in those claims. While that would not be at all conclusive as to their having that interest, it would indicate that the plaintiffs in the case thought they had an interest; the answer would indicate that the defendants thought they had an interest; and what we were trying to find out from Mr. Bell was the evidence, and all of the evidence, upon which he based his conclusion.

As a matter of fact, I will state frankly now as a lawyer—of course, lawyers differ with regard to these matters—that I do not think the evidence he submitted disclosed that they were dummy locators. That, of course, is a matter for different people to determine. I think Mr. Bell was absolutely sincere about it, and I think he told us very frankly what he based his conclusion upon. Since that time, so as to get an outside opinion of another lawyer, or to get the opinion of a lawyer for the benefit of the members of the committee who were not lawyers, the committee appointed an ex-Member of this body, an ex-Senator, former Senator Sterling, as the counsel and investigator of this committee to take all of the evidence that had ever been submitted to any committee we have, all of the evidence that has ever been submitted to the Department of Justice, everything that could be found, go into it, examine it, and make his report.

Former Senator Sterling was a distinguished Republican Member of this body. He was not even an independent. He has reported to the committee; and, as is published in to-day's paper, he did not find anything to justify the charges of Mr. Bell or any other charges.

That is the situation which you find to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am perfectly well aware of the attitude the Senator from Nevada took in this whole investigation, so far as the hearings disclosed his attitude. I am not quarreling with any conclusions at which the Senator may arrive. I am saying that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and to some degree the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] treated this witness, who was there to give light on this subject, there in the interest of the United States Government—he has no other interest—as if he were a hostile witness. They cross-examined him and they heckled him.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am reading the record, Mr. President, to show just how they heckled him——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. How he was subjected to this argument and this question and that question and the other question——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And I submit that in my judgment it was wrong.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I venture to assert that if Mr. Bell were interrogated about it, he would say that he was treated with every courtesy by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Well, let the Senate judge, and let the country judge. I am reading the testimony of Mr. Bell, and the questions that were propounded, and the manner in which they were propounded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will give you Mr. Bell's judgment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Just one word——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And now, one other word with reference to the Senator from Nevada. I grant the Senator that Mr. Bell could be mistaken.

Mr. Bell's report was chiefly an indictment. It was an indictment of the conditions that prevailed out there for years. It was a statement of what he believes is the fact or what are the facts connected with the whole Salt Creek situation. In fact, after his long study of years, it goes back years before the lands were withdrawn. But it seems to me it is wholly without the province of this committee, an impartial committee, or any member of the committee, to insist to Mr. Bell that, in their judgment or its judgment or his judgment, his facts are not correct, and that the conclusions he draws are unwarranted. This committee, if it is anything at all, is a committee that is directed by the Senate to procure the facts.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And if Mr. Bell could not supply all the facts, he could tell them where they could get additional facts, and, if necessary, the committee could go out into Wyoming, and go all over Wyoming, or all over the West, to the end that these lands might be reclaimed by the United States Government.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am suggesting that the report of the hearings indicates to an unprejudiced mind that the committee was prejudiced to begin with, if not against the investigation, certainly against Mr. Bell.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I can speak only for myself in the matter. I was not present on all occasions, because I did not know what Mr. Bell would testify to or what the facts were. As a member of the committee I hold that it is not my duty as a member of the committee to attempt to sustain the Government, or attempt to sustain one claiming title under the Government. Our committee has no authority of adjudication. What we were trying to do was to get Mr. Bell to submit to that committee every bit of evidence he had obtained in his long investigation, covering several years, and it was necessary, as he had filed a written statement, to question him for hours in trying to follow down to see what he had, and when he had completed his statement, after the long examination to which the Senator refers, he was asked the question, "Do you know of any other evidence bearing on this subject?" And you will find in the record that he said "No."

Some of us have listened to this matter on several occasions, have listened to it over years, not from this witness but from many witnesses; we had a number of investigations made, we paid $60,000 or more to have an investigation several years ago; if we had been prejudiced in this matter, if there had been any desire to hasten it or foreclose it, we would have sought a vote on it. There was no evidence of that at all. We did not even seek to foreclose further investigation.

Instead of that, the committee unanimously voted to employ disinterested, able, impartial counsel to take this evidence of Mr. Bell's, to take every charge that Mr. Bell had made, to take every letter that had been written to the committee, or the Department of Justice, or the Secretary of the Interior, to take every scrap of evidence and go out to Wyoming, or go to California, if necessary, to follow up these suspicions, these charges, investigate and report on them, and in doing that we selected an ex-Senator from this body, a Republican Senator, whose reputation is high, whose honor is unquestioned, whose ability as a lawyer is equal even to that of the Senator from Indiana, and we asked him to report to us.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, why was Senator Sterling chosen? I would like to have the Senator explain that to me.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will ask the Senator, why should he not have been chosen?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. For one reason, because he was interested in the leasing act and assisted in putting the leasing act through this body when he was a Member of this body.

Mr. PITTMAN. And the Senator says that every man——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I am not saying that. Wait until I have finished.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator means to say that every Senator in this body who voted for the leasing act is so prejudiced that he could not on behalf of the Government investigate as to whether or not a fraud had been committed against the Government?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I do not mean to say that. I am saying that he voted for the leasing act, and I have been informed that he was the father of several amendments to the act, some of which have been under very severe attack.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is not true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If that is true, does the Senator think he was a proper man to act as counsel for this committee?

Mr. PITTMAN. From whom did the Senator understand that an amendment to that bill offered by Senator Sterling was ever adopted?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have heard it from several sources.

Mr. PITTMAN. From whom?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think the RECORD so shows. I have been through the RECORD, and, if my memory serves me right, I think the RECORD will show that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then get the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator can have a page get him the RECORD and see if Senator Sterling did not, as a matter of fact, introduce amendments.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator means to charge——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator was here. Did Senator Sterling, or did he not, introduce amendments?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not remember that Senator Sterling ever introduced or offered an amendment in connection with that measure. I know one thing—that he was not responsible for any one of the so-called relief acts in that bill—not one of them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why was the Senator so anxious not to appoint Mr. Bell as counsel, a much younger man, who knows this whole subject?

Mr. PITTMAN. We wanted to appoint some one, a high-class lawyer——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. How about Mr. Bell?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. Bell is not a high-class man.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. He was five years Assistant Attorney General, and he is a Democrat, and nobody can say a word against his character or his courage.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not want a Democrat appointed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, that was it!

Mr. PITTMAN. I wanted to take this thing out of politics.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, I see! So the Senator wanted appointed a Republican, so that it would not be in politics.

Mr. PITTMAN. Absolutely; and stated in committee that I did not want to vote for any Democrat. I wanted a man appointed whose reputation was known, whose honor could not be questioned; and I am surprised that the Senator from Indiana should question either the honor or the purpose or the fairness or the integrity of the former great, distinguished Senator from this body who was chosen. He will not be agreed with by either Republican or Democrat on either side. As far as saying that a man may be prejudiced because he voted for the leasing bill, if the Senator will examine the RECORD he will find that 85 per cent of his colleagues who were here then and who voted for the leasing act are here now. He will find that only five or six Senators in this body voted against that bill. This selection was as impartial as it could possibly have been made, and it was unanimous.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, without going into that, I shall have something more to say about the counsel of the committee in a few minutes.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will have something to say to-morrow with regard to this particular subject myself, in which I will quote the record and not make assertions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator can do that in his own time. I have been very generous with him in giving him whatever of my time he wanted.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Nevada. I understood him to say that the adoption of the leasing act was unanimous. I am told that he maintained that the selection of Mr. Sterling was unanimous by the committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. I stated that, according to my recollection, about 85 per cent of the United States Senate voted for the leasing act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Did not the Senator say also——

Mr. NYE. The Senator did not maintain, then, that the selection of Senator Sterling as counsel for the committee was unanimous on the part of the committee?

Mr. PITTMAN. It was by unanimous vote, I understand.

Mr. NYE. It was not, Mr. President.

Mr. PITTMAN. Who voted against him?

Mr. NYE. I did.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did anyone else?

Mr. NYE. Not that I know of.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the record disclose that the Senator voted "no"?

Mr. NYE. The record discloses my opposition.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the record disclose that the Senator voted "no"?

Mr. NYE. As I recall it, there was no roll call upon that subject.

Mr. PITTMAN. No roll call upon the subject?

Mr. NYE. No roll call.

Mr. PITTMAN. Who voted "no"? Did anyone?

Mr. NYE. It was by the choice of the committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did the Senator state at the time we selected him, "I want to be recorded as opposed to this selection"?

Mr. NYE. I certainly did, Mr. President.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no recollection of it.

Mr. NYE. I most assuredly did.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no recollection of it, for the simple reason that when Senator Sterling's name came up there, when we selected him there, by a vote of that committee, if there was any single, solitary vote against him, I never heard it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator from Nevada does not question the Senator from North Dakota in that statement, does he?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not question anything except his recollection as to a vote. As to whether or not he was opposed to him is a matter I know nothing about. If he says he is opposed to him, he is opposed to him; I do not doubt his word. But certainly nothing took place to indicate that every member of that committee was not satisfied with his appointment, at least that anyone was opposing his appointment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, more remarkable still, from pages 258, 259, 260, and 261:

Senator KENDRICK. I wanted to ask you a question there, Mr. Bell. For some time, in reference to those contracts, you have referred to them as a matter of record in Natrona County, and also as to this reference to them, as I understand, in the affidavits, they are referred to in those affidavits. Did it not strike you that if there had been anything questionable about the validity of those contracts that they would have been withheld from record?

Mr. BELL. Well, if the gentlemen who placed them on record had had any knowledge of their invalidity, of course, they would not have done that.

Senator KENDRICK. Well, the affidavits of Mr. Schuyler and Mr. Shoup, as I recall, testified to their knowledge of the mining law and the placer claims, and about things dealing with oil locations on the part, as I remember it, of Henshaw and Fitzhugh. It is stated under oath that they were both experienced in that kind of location, and particular reference is made as to their familiarity with what constituted a valid location.

Mr. BELL. I have no knowledge of the experience or information that either Fitzhugh or Henshaw had, Senator.

Senator KENDRICK. But the affidavits, I mean, testified to that effect.

Mr. BELL. Yes. At this point, as you mention those affidavits, I want to add that I had no knowledge of what was going on in the Interior Department in connection with the applicants for these leases and did not see these affidavits until I think the day that the matter was presented orally before the Secretary.

Now, something has been said about no reply having been made to those affidavits by Mr. Bouton or myself. I considered that when I gave the Secretary of the Interior the information contained in that memorandum and handed him the original of it that day, and the information contained in my oral statement to him, that I had done my duty. The law imposed no further duty upon the Department of Justice to make any contrary showing. The fact of the matter is the law imposed the duty upon the Secretary of the Interior to administer the leasing act. I had no right or authority under the law to proceed to try any sort of a case or present further evidence to the Secretary of the Interior.

Senator WALSH. You were there really only for the purpose of helping him?

Mr. BELL. That was my only purpose and thought that when I furnished that much evidence to the Secretary of the Interior I had performed my duty, and that it was his duty and obligation to make proper investigation and ascertain the facts in connection with these applications for leases, and I did not ask, as I remember it, that the leases be rejected. I asked that testimony be taken before the register and receiver of the land office and all the facts ascertained, and that these leases not be granted on ex parte application or showings made by the applicants themselves. That was the only thing I asked. I wanted the Secretary not to start into this thing without full knowledge of the situation. That was all.

Senator PITTMAN. As a matter of fact, there was really but one question involved in those leases, and that was under the section of the act that if they had reasonable ground to believe that fraud had been committed by those locators, we will say, that then they were bound by that fraud and could not obtain a lease. That is true, is it not?

Mr. BELL. That was my idea of it, Senator.

Senator PITTMAN. Exactly. Now, then, what notice did the companies have of fraud? That was the contract, was it, because they were assumed to have notice of it?

Mr. BELL. It was the contract. It was the thorough information that Mr. Shoup and Mr. Schuyler must have had of the whole situation when they negotiated the contract with Henshaw, as I have said, they refer to the contracts between Fitzhugh and Henshaw.

Senator PITTMAN. Exactly. That is true, is it not? Now, the question is they had notice of the contract, did they not?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Senator PITTMAN. Now, we admit that. Everybody admits it. It is proven at least that they had notice of the contracts.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Senator PITTMAN. Now, then, if those contracts were, as you claim, that those were dummy locations, then they had knowledge of the fraud, because dummy locations are fraudulent.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Senator PITTMAN. They had knowledge of the fraud, and they could not obtain a lease, but the construction of the contract determined whether or not there was fraud. You contended that it showed fraud. Personally, I do not think it is proved.

There, Mr. President, was the position of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] long before the investigation had been concluded.

Senator WALSH. Let me put it this way, Mr. Bell: If the contracts are fraudulent on their face, then these people had notice and they did not exonerate themselves as the statute required. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. BELL. I think so.

Senator WALSH. Well, then, does it not all come back to the question, then, as to whether these contracts do show that the locations were dummy locations?

Mr. BELL. No; because there might have been a great deal of other evidence.

Senator WALSH. Other evidence?

Mr. BELL. Yes; we are not confined to those contracts.

Senator WALSH. And you did not feel under any obligation to go and hunt up the other evidence?

Mr. BELL. My recollection is, Senator, that there was a vast amount of other evidence that had been accumulated over a period of a great many years by agents of the Land Office and was on file in the Land Office. Whether the Secretary had actual knowledge of this information in that office or not, I do not know, but I thought it my duty to advise him in a general way of the facts.

Senator PITTMAN. Had you not been, as an examiner for the Department of Justice, making your preparation of your case to file these bills?

Mr. BELL. About the first work I did was a study of the files and assisted in preparing these bills.

Senator PITTMAN. Did you not prepare your case and get the evidence as diligently as you would expect the Secretary of the Interior to do?

Mr. BELL. Why, certainly. I was making every effort to be familiar with this situation.

Senator PITTMAN. How long had you been preparing this case before you prepared these bills?

Mr. BELL. I became connected in an unofficial way, as I remember, in November, 1918, with these oil-land matters, and these leases were granted in the latter part of January and February; I think the greater part of them in 1921.

Now, I had spent a good portion of that time in connection with these matters.

Senator WALSH. The information that we got was that while a considerable number of them were authorized in January and February of 1921, the leases themselves were not executed until the new administration came in.

Mr. BELL. Yes; I see.

Senator PITTMAN. Let me follow this up just a second, sir. You commenced to investigate this Salt Creek oil field when?

Mr. BELL. In November, 1918, Senator, to the best of my recollection.

Senator PITTMAN. November, 1918; and you continued that investigation until you filed these bills?

Mr. BELL. The bills were never filed.

Senator PITTMAN. I mean until you prepared the bills.

Mr. BELL. A good portion of my time was spent in connection with these oil-land matters.

Senator PITTMAN. When did you prepare these bills?

Mr. BELL. During the winter of 1918 and 1919.

Senator PITTMAN. 1918 and 1919?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Senator PITTMAN. Did you have any facts with regard to that available to you outside of what you got?

Mr. BELL. A vast amount of data collected by the agents of the General Land Office.

Senator PITTMAN. Did you file your bill or prepare your bill until you had gotten all of the information that you could get?

Mr. BELL. I thought we had a fair idea of the situation when these bills were drawn.

Senator PITTMAN. And you felt you had sufficient information to justify the filing of those bills and the prosecuting of those suits?

Mr. BELL. Absolutely.

Senator PITTMAN. Did you conceal anything from the Secretary of the Interior at the time you had your hearing before him in 1920?

Mr. BELL. I have never concealed anything in connection with these from anybody.

Senator PITTMAN. Then you presented everything to him that you had when you prepared your bills?

Mr. BELL. No; I do not mean to say that at all.

Senator PITTMAN. Did you gather something between the time you prepared the bills and the time you appeared and testified before him in 1920?

Mr. BELL. I certainly acquired a much more accurate knowledge of the situation between the time I prepared these bills and the time I presented this matter to the Secretary.

Senator PITTMAN. Did you include the additional matter in your report to him?

Mr. BELL. Why, Senator, I did not undertake to go into all the details in presenting this matter to the Secretary; not at all.

Senator PITTMAN. Why did you conceal some parts of this information when you were trying to urge him to bring proceedings not to grant those leases?

I point out that this was the Government's witness being dealt with in this matter.

Mr. BELL. I did not conceal any information.

Senator PITTMAN. Well, if you gathered information between the time you prepared that bill in 1918 and when you made your report in 1920, why did you not include it in your report?

Mr. BELL. I have stated that I considered it my duty, not under the law but my duty under my oath and as a special assistant to the Attorney General, to give the Secretary of the Interior enough of the facts pertaining to the fraudulent character of these locations and the knowledge of fraud so that he might be on his guard.

Senator PITTMAN. Now I want something you did not have in the report. That is what we want to know. Let us take what you did not have in the report.

Mr. BELL. I am not sure that the report calls attention to the fact that the Fitzhugh-Henshaw locations were made after the order of withdrawal. I am quite confident the report does not contain an outline of the dummy character of a large number of these locations made from 1883 on down to 1908.

Senator PITTMAN. I am not referring to those. I am only referring to the Henshaw-Fitzhugh locations. Now, is there any information with regard to those which you did not have in that report?

Mr. BELL. Well, I would not undertake to say. I do not remember.

Senator PITTMAN. We would like to know, as a committee, if you have any information.

Mr. BELL. I understand that, Senator; and I am giving you the best I can from my recollection, having been disconnected from the work entirely for six or seven years. Now, for instance, we have in the files, or had in the files, a statement of Mr. Knowles, one of the Fitzhugh-Henshaw locators, in which he admitted that he had no interest in these locations. I believe that is in my memorandum.

Senator WALSH. It is here; yes.

Senator PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. BELL. And then I believe the investigation showed that others of the locators——

Senator PITTMAN (interposing). Did you give that at the hearings?

Mr. BELL. I think so, but I am not positive.

Senator PITTMAN. I know you did. But, now, what knowledge did the companies applying for leases have as to what this man had in his mind, one of these locators, that he never had any interest?

Mr. BELL. They had the knowledge acquired by Mr. Shoup and Mr. Schuyler, who organized the Midwest Oil Co., the Reed Investment Co., and the little Reed companies. They became the officers, directors, and the stockholders of those companies.

Mr. President, that was an interesting examination, but the witness continues to testify that there was both fraud and monopoly (pp. 266–267):

Mr. BELL. I have never been fully convinced that the relief provisions in the act, unless they were very judicially administered, were feasible, Senator.

Senator WALSH. That is to say, you feel the relief provisions opened the door for fraud?

Mr. BELL. You can accept the present situation. I feel that there is fraud. I feel that there was fraud in these claims to this field, and ordinarily applicants had knowledge of it, and these leases ought not to have been issued.

Senator WALSH. For the present, Mr. Bell, I wanted to see what your attitude was with respect to the law itself. Now, if it be admitted that the original prospector, the good-faith prospector, who went out into the desert, miles away from anywhere, the Government never knowing or even suspecting that there was any oil there at all, actually went out there and took—risked his money in the matter and had sunk the well and had not really got oil anywhere, so he had not any legal title to the property at all when the withdrawal order came on, but he went on, persisted, actually demonstrated by his actual results that the property was immensely valuable to the Government of the United States. We want to take the case of that fellow. Do you think that the law ought to make provision for him?

Mr. BELL. That is a very sympathetic case, Senator.

Senator WALSH. So that, so far as the law is concerned, you find no fault with the law except that the opportunities for fraudulent claims were opened up?

Mr. BELL. It appears to me—that appears to be the situation. What has happened in the Salt Creek field? One concern is getting the oil to-day, all of it, as a practical proposition from the Salt Creek field—namely, the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that concern interesting itself at the time of the hearings prior to the enactment of the leasing law?

Mr. BELL. The whole property and all the claims in a measure had been consolidated in the Midwest Refining Co. I think that was about January, 1914, that the Midwest Refining Co. was organized, and through the representatives of the Midwest Refining Co. they were seeking the enactment of the relief provisions, and it was the Midwest Refining Co. that has had the relief and not the old prospector who went out and spent his life and his money.

Senator WALSH. If the Midwest Refining Co. was the transferee of that old prospector, of course it was entitled to just the same relief, Mr. Bell. * * *

Senator KENDRICK (interposing). Well, now, you investigated that field when you were out there?

Mr. BELL. I did, Senator. I think at that time I had a fairly comprehensive knowledge of the situation. And I want to say this, that my recollection is that the Reed interests paid Fitzhugh $10,000, and the rest of the consideration he was to get out of the oil, if he got anything. They paid Henshaw $325,000—$25,000 cash, and the balance, if he ever got any balance, was to be paid out of the oil—so that the Reed interests actually paid $35,000 in cash and acquired a majority of the lands of the valuable Salt Creek field. Perhaps you consider that a big consideration to be paid by them at that time, but it does not appear to me to be the fact.

Mr. President, that was the testimony of Mr. Bell, showing how the Salt Creek field was acquired and taken from the United States. From the foregoing it appears conclusively that the witness can not be shaken in his statements.

At pages 272–273 appears the following:

Mr. BELL. But, as a practical proposition, according to all the information I have been able to obtain, the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana receives most of the oil that comes from the Salt Creek field.

Senator KENDRICK. Receives it at its refinery?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Senator KENDRICK. That does not interfere with the development of the field, not the operation of the leases.

Mr. BELL. And the Midwest Refining Co., that is owned almost wholly by the Standard of Indiana, has contracts with all these applicants, all of these leaseholders in the Salt Creek field, whereby the Midwest Refining Co. gets the oil. In other words, according to all the information I have at my command, the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana has practically a monopoly of the oil business in Wyoming and adjacent thereto, not only for producing but also the transportation through pipe lines, the refinery and distribution of the oil, and the Government is largely responsible for the situation because of its method of leasing the Salt Creek field and the sale of the Salt Creek royalties; and then it finished the job by leasing the Teapot naval reserve to certain other interests that were controlled by the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana.

Senator WALSH. The committee wants what information they can get about that. Let us understand about that. The Standard Oil Co. owns practically all the stock of the Midwest Refining Co. and the Midwest Refining Co. owns the—but if there are independent operators in the field, there is nothing in the law to prevent all of them from selling their oil to the refining company, is there?

Mr. BELL. I think there is nothing in the law, but as a practical proposition, if the situation is now as it was when I made an investigation of the situation, it would hardly be possible for them to accomplish much independently because the pipe lines are owned by the Midwest interests. The refinery is owned by the Midwest interests. They have a greater part of the production of the field, if not through the ownership of subsidiary companies themselves, they acquired it through operating agreements or contracts entered into, I think, in 1914, extending for a period of 20 years, that gave them almost a complete monopoly of the whole Salt Creek field.

Here is evidence of monopoly gone mad, just what the committee was directed to ascertain, but there is not a word on that subject in the report of the Senator from Montana.

Finally, on page 275, the witness gives his conclusions definitely in answer to questions by the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN—

The junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is the chairman of the committee—

It has been very helpful, Mr. Bell. There is just one question: Do you feel that the filing of suits at the time you were making your investigation was prevented by any source at all?

Mr. BELL. I can answer that only by giving hearsay testimony. I was advised by officials or employees of the Department of Justice that the Attorney General did not desire the bills of complaint filed; that the matter was in course of settlement, and they were not filed because those of us in charge felt that we did not have, at least, specific authority to file them.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in conclusion: Do you think a thorough examination might eventually disclose under the law the opportunity and the occasion for annulling and canceling leases and contracts which had been granted in that field?

I say "might."

Mr. BELL. Yes; the Government owns title to this land. There are certain lessees on the land. If the Government in its investigation should ascertain leases were obtained in violation of the fraud provisions of the leasing act, I would think that suits to cancel these leases could be successfully maintained.

So there you are, Mr. President.

Mr. Bell believes, and I believe, that the enormously valuable Salt Creek field can be recovered for the people of the United States. At any rate, the effort should be made.

In my judgment this committee should be authorized to carry over its work into the next Congress, and I have no doubt that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska will insist that this is done.

Furthermore, Mr. Bell should be engaged as counsel for the committee. Let Senator Sterling continue if it be desired, but in any event, let the Government have the services of the one man who is thoroughly conversant with the whole situation. He knows of the rottenness and corruption that exist there, and has the courage to expose it.

Fortunately, in the person of the Senator from North Dakota, the committee has a chairman who commands universal confidence.

Let us get down to rock bottom, have done with side issues and smoke screens, and recover for the American people the heritage that is rightly theirs.

Mr. President, at this point I ask to have inserted again in the RECORD a copy of the so-called Bell report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

LEASING SALT CREEK OIL FIELD

Leases to the withdrawn oil lands of the Salt Creek field, Natrona County, Wyo., have been requested under the act of February 25, 1920, by:

Applicant:	Acreage applied for
Wyoming Associated Oil Corporation	5,963
Midwest Oil Co	1,970
Central Wyoming Oil & Development Co	920
Petroleum Maatschappij Salt Creek	160
Salt Creek Consolidated Oil Co	2,347
E. J. Sullivan, trustee	560
Mountain & Gulf Oil Co	960
New York Oil Co	120
New York Oil Co. and Northwestern Oil Co	480
National Petroleum Co	960
Federal Oil & Development Co	320
Parkman Oil Co	160
Total	14,920

These applications should be denied because—

1. The applicants have been guilty of fraud, had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of fraud, and have not acted honestly and in good faith.

2. The applicants are requesting a greater acreage than the maximum allowed by said act, and the leases if granted as requested, or at least interests therein, would inure to persons, associations, or corporations for a greater aggregate area or acreage than the maximum in said act provided for.

FRAUD

Section 18 of the act of February 25, 1920, provides:

"No claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud, or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section."

All the debates in both the Senate and House of Representatives, all the records of hearings before the Committees on Public Lands and the reports of these committees, show that the question of fraud was a subject of very serious consideration when this act was before Congress. Because of the fact that rights were to be conferred that did not then exist under the law, it was feared that relief might be extended to claimants who were not justly entitled thereto. The above-mentioned provision, which was included in the bill introduced in the Senate, was modified in the House so as to be less stringent, but was adopted in conference and finally enacted. It does not require that a claimant shall be guilty of fraud or shall have actual knowledge of fraud, but only that a claimant shall have had reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or shall not have acted honestly and in good faith. It now behooves those who administer or interpret this law to give it the effect it was intended to have. This intention of Congress is indicated in the language of Senator Lenroot, as follows:

"But the Senator forgets that this entire section is a section extending a privilege to a certain class of claimants. The Senator well knows that it is this section that has caused the greatest controversies of any portion of the oil-leasing legislation. Complaint has constantly been made that legislation which has been proposed in the past has opened the door of relief to fraudulent claimants. This is the strongest provision against fraud that has ever been found in any relief section in an oil leasing bill." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 66th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 58, p. 4536.)

The rights asserted by the claimants were initiated under the placer mining laws, a provision of which is as follows:

"Legal subdivisions of 40 acres may be subdivided into 10-acre tracts; and two or more persons, or associations of persons having contiguous claims of any size, although such claims may be less than 10 acres each, may make joint entry thereof; but no location of a placer claim, made after the 9th day of July, 1870, shall exceed 160 acres for any one person or association of persons, which location shall conform to the United States surveys; and nothing in this section contained shall defeat or impair any bona fide preemption or homestead claim upon agricultural lands, or authorize the sale of the improvements of any bona fide settler to any purchaser." (Act July 9, 1870, 16 Stat. L. 217, 6 Fed. Stat. Ann. 577, sec. 2330.)

Another provision is as follows:

"When placer claims are upon surveyed lands and conform to legal subdivisions no further survey of plat shall be required, and all placer claims located after the 10th day of May, 1872, shall conform as near as practicable with the United States system of public-land surveys, and the rectangular subdivisions of such surveys, and no such location shall include more than 20 acres for each individual claimant; but where placer claims can not be conformed to legal subdivisions survey and plat shall be made as on unsurveyed lands; and whereby the segregation of mineral lands in any legal subdivision a quantity of agricultural land less than 40 acres remains, such fractional portion of agricultural land may be entered by any party qualified by law for homestead or preemption purposes." (Act of May 10, 1872, 17 Stat. L. 94, 6 Fed. Stat. Ann. 579, sec. 2331.)

The object of these provisions is to limit the quantity of placer mineral land which may be located by one person to 20 acres, in order to make a general distribution among as large a number as possible, rather than favor a few individuals who might wish to acquire princely fortunes by securing large tracts of such lands, and to secure the prompt development of such lands as are located; therefore it is contrary to this policy for one person to cover more than 20 acres by one location by the device of using the names of his employees, friends, and relatives as locators.

Regardless of any kind of a definition that might be given for "fraud," the courts repeatedly have held that it is a fraud on the law and on the Government where locations are not made in good faith for the use and benefit of the named locators, each with an interest not to exceed 20 acres. Such a scheme is condemned in the case of Cook v. Klonos et al. (164 Fed. 529), wherein the court said:

"The prohibition contained in section 2231 against the location of 'more than 20 acres for each individual claimant' is direct and positive and limits the amount of ground that any one claimant may appropriate, either individually or in association claim, at the time of the location. * * * The question here is not whether an individual can purchase mining claims after they have been located and hold them in his own name but whether an individual can, by the use of the names of his friends, relatives, or employees as dummies, locate for his own benefit a greater area of mining ground than that allowed by law. * * * The few restrictions imposed are only intended to prevent the primary location and accumulation of large tracts of land by a few persons, and to encourage the exploration of the mineral resources of the public land by actual bona fide locators. The scheme of using the names of dummy locators in making the locations of a mining claim for the purpose of securing a concealed interest in such claim appears to be contrary to the purpose of the statute; but when this scheme is used to secure an interest in a claim for a single individual, not only concealed but in excess of the limit of 20 acres, it is plainly in violation of the letter of the law, and when, as in this case, all the locators had knowledge of the concealed interest and were parties to the transaction, it rendered the location void."

In the case of Nome & Sinook v. Snyder (187 Fed. 385–388, 389) the court said:

"It follows, therefore, with exact logic, that five persons may by means of proper association make valid location of 100 acres in one claim, so that it did not include more than 20 acres to each individual. This does not mean that while the five may, by associating themselves together, locate 100 acres in one claim, one or two of the five can acquire by such location substantially all the claim, leaving the others with proportionately a very small or normal interest therein.

"Any scheme or device entered into whereby one individual is to acquire more than that amount or proportion in area constitutes a fraud upon the law, and consequently a fraud upon the Government, from which the title is to be acquired, and any location made in pursuance of such scheme or device is without legal support and void. The proposition seems to be well established.

"Now, in the case under review, the very articles of agreement put the claimant beyond the pale of the law, while the testimony establishes the illegality of the scheme beyond peradventure. The location, although made in the name of the association, two of the parties thereto were to have but a nominal interest in the claim, one less than one-fifth, and one more than one-half, giving the latter, of course, more than 50 acres proportionately in the claim. So that, regardless of the discovery, regardless of the marking of the ground, or even the assessment work, the claim was void and could not avail the locators in any stage."

In the case of The United States v. Brookshire Oil Co. et al (242 Fed. 718–721) the court said:

"It is manifest that Burge could acquire no right in mineral lands as against the Government by such subterfuge, and since the Brookshire Co. was in possession and claiming under him, and as his representative or agent, it necessarily follows that its interest was no greater than his. It is true there is no limitation as to the number of mining claims an individual or association of individuals may locate, but it is provided that no claim shall exceed 20 acres for each individual (sec. 2331, R. S.; Comp. St. 1916, par. 4630), or 160 acres for an association (sec. 2330, R. S.; Comp. St. 1916, par. 4629). This is a direct and positive limitation of the amount of mining ground any one claimant may appropriate individually or as a member of an association in any one claim, and he can not evade the law by the use of the names of his friends, relatives, or employees. Any device whereby one person is to acquire more than 20 acres, or an association more than 160 acres in area, by one discovery, constitutes a fraud upon the Government and is without legal support and void."

HENSHAW-FITZHUGH LOCATIONS

Preferential rights to leases to nearly all the Salt Creek field, which was withdrawn by Executive order of September 27, 1909, are based on what are generally known as the Henshaw-Fitzhugh locations which were made in the spring of 1910. These locations were void not only because they were made subsequent to the order of withdrawal but also because none of the said locations were made in good faith and for the use and benefit of the named locators, each with an interest not to exceed 20 acres of each tract; in other words, the locators were what are commonly called "dummies." These locations, 120 in number, were made by residents of San Francisco and Oakland, Calif., as follows:

"William G. Henshaw, financier; Hetty T. Henshaw, wife of William G. Henshaw; William M. Fitzhugh, mining operator; and Mary E. Fitzhugh, wife of William M. Fitzhugh."

The name of the four parties above mentioned were used on each of the 120 locations with four of the following, without any apparent method of selection or rotation:

"W. F. Henshaw, brother of William C. Henshaw; Helen W. Henshaw, wife of F. W. Henshaw; Lillie T. Hall, sister of Hetty T. Henshaw; E. N. Hall, husband of Lillie T. Hall; Alla S. Chickering, daughter of William C. Henshaw; Harry Chickering, husband of Alla S. Chickering; Ethel K. Nichols, niece of Hetty T. Henshaw; Henry D. Nichols, husband of Ethel K. Nichols; and H. J. Knowles."

The names of the four following-mentioned parties, all employees of William G. Henshaw, were used, two of them once and two of them twice:

"Charles T. Rudolph, Emil Nusbaumer, William H. Metcalf, and P. C. Black."

William G. Henshaw, a financier, furnished all the money for the enterprise, while William M. Fitzhugh made the locations and was to do such work in the field as was deemed necessary. Evidence is abundant that these two men were the parties in interest and that they received the profits of their operations.

H. J. Knowles freely admits that his name was used as an accommodation to William G. Henshaw, and that he never had any interest in the locations. The use of the names of the majority of these locators cost Henshaw the munificent sum of $12.50 for each time each name was used. But the best evidence of the character of these locations is contained in contracts—of record—between William G. Henshaw and William M. Fitzhugh which purport to define their respective interests. One of the contracts, dated August 15, 1909, recorded May 25, 1911, in Book 2 A. C. & L., 456 Natrona County, Wyo., provided "That Henshaw should have three-fourths and Fitzhugh one-fourth of any profits or property derived from the same, disposition, or development of any such property." Said contract further provided that a corporation should be organized to which all properties should be conveyed, and that "in consideration of such conveyances said corporation shall issue to the parties hereto its entire capital stock in the following proportions: To the party of the first part—Fitzhugh—one-quarter thereof, and to the party of the second part—Henshaw—three-quarters thereof."

Henshaw did not claim the right to a three-fourths interest because of representing himself and five associates in each location, but because he was furnishing the money for the enterprise, as recited in a paragraph of the contract of August 15, 1909, as follows:

"Said party of the second part hereby covenants and agrees, to advance, from time to time during such period as he shall elect to finance said project as aforesaid, any and all sums of money required to carry the interest of said party of the first part in said lands, leases, property, and corporation, and it is expressly understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that two-quarters of said three-quarters' interest of said party of the second part is the consideration for the promise and covenant on the part of said party of the second part in this paragraph contained."

The contract of August 15, 1909, further provided "that upon the organization of such corporation and issuance of stock thereof the stock to which said party of the first part is entitled shall be issued and delivered to said party of the second part (Henshaw) as trustee, who shall hold the same in trust for said party of the first part for the term of five years, with the power, and said party of the second part is hereby given and granted for said period of five years the full and complete power to manage, control, sell, hypothecate, and dispose of all said stock so issued as aforesaid, and all the assets and property of said corporation, or any part of either of said stock, assets, or property for the joint benefit of the parties hereto, as their interests are herein set forth, upon such terms and in such manner as the best judgment of said party of the second part may dictate and determine."

This provision, it will be perceived, gave Henshaw absolute control of the enterprise.

Because of the uncertainty of this contract applying to the lands of the Salt Creek field, which they had not yet located, a supplement thereto was executed November 16, 1909, as follows:

"This is to certify that the attached contract dated August 15, 1909, between us, the undersigned, is hereby modified to the following effect and extent, to wit: The said Fitzhugh shall have 25 per cent and the said Henshaw shall have 75 per cent of all profits made by the said Henshaw, either directly or indirectly, from all oil lands or oil or gas discovered or produced from any lands or oil or gas interests either may acquire in the State of Wyoming, or either have acquired in the said State. This is intended to cover contracts, leases, conveyances, and other and all manner of methods of acquisition."

It would seem that no further evidence is necessary to prove conclusively the fraudulent scheme of these parties, but if so, it may be found in the record of the case of Wm. M. Fitzhugh et al. v. The Midwest Oil Co. et al. in the District Court of the United States for the District of Arizona, in the testimony of both William G. Henshaw and William M. Fitzhugh. For brevity I will not quote this testimony, but will refer to the "Memorandum on the bona fides of the Fitzhugh-Henshaw group of locators," submitted by A. B. Bouton, Esq., special assistant to the United States attorney, dated March 1, 1920, wherein the pertinent parts may be found. In all the testimony and statements of these parties, in their correspondence, and in their contracts it nowhere appears that any locator, except William G. Henshaw and William M. Fitzhugh, had any interest whatever, and William G. Henshaw claimed the "lion's share" of the profits and the right to control, because he furnished the capital. The contracts were executed by and between William G. Henshaw and William M. Fitzhugh only; and it does not appear that the other locators were represented therein or that their rights, if any, were taken into consideration. The provisions for the distribution of the profits and for the division of the capital stock of the corporation to be organized brand the locators as dummies, the locations illegal, and the whole plan as a fraud on the law and on the Government.

The above analysis of the agreement between Henshaw and Fitzhugh makes the locations bad enough, but let us consider briefly the interpretation thereof by Henshaw and later by his grantees. Henshaw contended that as the agreement of November 16, 1909, provided "The said Fitzhugh shall have 25 per cent, and the said Henshaw shall have 75 per cent, of all profits made by the said Henshaw, either directly or indirectly, from all oil lands or oil or gas discovered or produced from any lands or oil or gas interests either may acquire in the State of Wyoming or either have acquired in the said State," he was entitled to three-fourths of Fitzhugh's one-fourth. Strange as it may seem, he did not admit that his construction would give Fitzhugh a one-fourth interest in his three-fourths.

This interpretation, of course, would make Fitzhugh and wife dummies, because it would give Henshaw 30 acres of the 40 acres of each location, presumably the property of Fitzhugh and wife. If it were Henshaw's idea that the agreement entitled Fitzhugh to a one-fourth interest in his (Henshaw's) share (20 acres) of each location (which nowhere appears) still this would make Fitzhugh and wife dummies, as Henshaw would then have an interest in each location equivalent to 45 acres, and Fitzhugh and wife together only 15 acres. This is assuming, of course, that Henshaw's associates each had an interest of 20 acres, which at all times must be done to give the locations validity. If it should be contended that this agreement gave Henshaw and associates a three-fourths interest in the share of Fitzhugh and wife and mutually give the latter a one-fourth interest in the share of Henshaw and associates, then Henshaw would have had no basis whatever for the "claim" or cause of action against Fitzhugh which he asserted, because the ultimate outcome under such a construction would have resulted in Henshaw getting three-fourths and Fitzhugh one-fourth of each location, which was not Henshaw's position at any time. It is impossible to arrive at any conclusion other than that Henshaw set out to acquire for himself practically all of each location of 160 acres.

The Reed interests, of Denver, Colo.—so called because they were financed and controlled by Verner Z. Reed and associates—purchased the claims of Henshaw and Fitzhugh. The negotiations on behalf of the Reed interests were conducted by Oliver N. Shoup, secretary and general manager of the Reed Investment Co. and Karl C. Schuyler, attorney. Fitzhugh conveyed to the Midwest Oil Co., a Reed company, on June 3, 1911, for a consideration of approximately 33 cents per barrel for the oil. In this transaction it was understood that Shoup and Schuyler should negotiate with Henshaw for a partition or segregation of Fitzhugh's interest in each location; accordingly they went to California and entered into negotiations with Henshaw July 21, 1911, which resulted in the Reed Investment Co. taking an option to purchase Henshaw's interest. Soon thereafter this transaction was completed by conveyance to the nine "Little Reed Companies."

Notwithstanding the fact that Shoup and Schuyler were the agents, representatives, and attorneys of Fitzhugh, as well as the Midwest Oil Co., they purchased Henshaw's so-called claim or cause of action above mentioned against Fitzhugh and without Fitzhugh's knowledge.

This claim was taken in the name of one F. P. Evans, who assigned all rights and interests acquired by him to O. H. Shoup, "trustee."

It is stated in an affidavit subscribed and sworn to by Karl C. Schuyler on December 6, 1920, and submitted to the Secretary of the Interior December 7, 1920, that "affiant and said O. H. Shoup also felt that as soon as Fitzhugh's anger subsided he might and probably would be willing to pay the sum of $25,000 to clear the matter up, especially if the claim should be asserted to some one other than the Henshaw interests, and for this reason the details of the transaction were not disclosed to Fitzhugh." At no time was Fitzhugh given an opportunity to settle the matter for $25,000. (Apparently his anger, like Tennyson's Brook, ran on forever and forever.) Two years thereafter he was sued on this claim in Natrona County, Wyo., not in the name of Shoup or Schuyler or any of the Reed companies, but by the California Oil Lands Co., a concern organized by Shoup and Schuyler in California for the sole purpose of bringing the suit. Not then did they let Fitzhugh know that they had brought the "claim" and were "after him." They still pretended to be his friends and counselors and that Henshaw was "the villain who still pursued him." They urged him by every conceivable artifice to settle, not for $25,000, but for 19 per cent of what he was to receive for his oil.

Fitzhugh in 1917 learned that he had been deceived, swindled, and defrauded, and soon thereafter filed suit against Shoup, Schuyler, the Midwest Oil Co. et al. in the District Court of the United States for Arizona, alleging the fraud and deceit above stated. This suit was compromised and all interest in the Salt Creek field purchased for the sum of $2,250,000.

IBA AND OTHER LOCATIONS

A large number of locations on the field were made under the placer mining law prior to the locations made by Henshaw and Fitzhugh. So-called claims of title issuing from these locations have been acquired by the applicants, and it is contended that these claims confer preferential rights to leases. Space will not permit us to detail the facts relative to these numerous locations; in fact, we must be content with stating conclusions only. Evidence is abundant in contracts and documents of record, in statements, affidavits, and sworn testimony that these locations are fully as bad as those made by Henshaw and Fitzhugh. They were and still are void and in violation of the law, because none of said locations was made and maintained in good faith for the use and benefit of the locators, each with an interest not to exceed 20 acres of each tract, and none of said locations was made in good faith for the purpose of developing the petroleum resources of any of said tracts by the named locators, but were made in every case for the purpose of excluding real prospectors from the land by a pretense of complying with the law until the locations could be sold at a profit to the real party in interest.

As many as eight locations were made on the same tracts, some as early as February, 1883; but most of them were entirely abandoned. However, the locations made by one Cy Iba, in 1887, are alleged to have some vitality. As evidence of the "dummy" character of these locations, we quote from a power of attorney to Iba from his colocators, as follows:

"* * * and having located the same, to appropriate the same to his sole use, together with all the right, title, and interest in the same, we selling and conveying the same to him as our grantee, for a valuable consideration." * * *

(This is an example of volumes of evidence that might be included herein.)

Iba used the names of more than 100 persons from whom he obtained powers of attorney containing the above-named provision, before the locations were made. None of his colocators ever claimed any interest or received any benefits or profits.

Certain of the above-named applicants before they had settled their differences and joined in their common cause against the United States, alleged and contended in a number of "adverse" proceedings in the district court of Natrona County, Wyo., that the Iba locations were void and unlawful, because the locators were dummies and the locations were entirely abandoned long prior to the order of withdrawal. Surely these same applicants will not now be permitted to avail themselves of the claims that they once contended were so bad.

The question naturally presenting itself is, Why were so many locations made and why were they invariably bad? The reason is simple. Some ambitious individual who had acquired some knowledge of the oil business would hear something about the prospects for oil at Salt Creek. Such an individual, of course, was not content with one location of 20 acres, or a number of locations in which he had an interest of only 20 acres, so he would borrow the names of his friends and relatives and proceed to locate for his own use and benefit vast areas of the public lands. Generally no pretense was made at complying with the law in any respect, except to make the "paper" location so as to acquire a color of title which might be sold at a profit to some real oil operator or promoter.

For several years delegations appeared before Congressmen, Senators, and other officials, beseeching "relief" for the poor, honest, oppressed prospectors, who were much discussed, but in truth unknown to the history of the Salt Creek field. If such ever existed they have long since, at the behest of the Midwest interests, vi et armis or otherwise passed on.

KNOWLEDGE OF FRAUD

The contracts above mentioned, between Henshaw and Fitzhugh, were on record in Natrona County, Wyo., wherein the Salt Creek field is situated, therefore, every applicant basing a claim on the Henshaw-Fitzhugh locations had notice of their contents, and consequently of their fraudulent character. The Iba powers of attorney likewise were of record. Moreover, the applicants had actual knowledge of the fraud, by and through the knowledge, acts, and conduct of their incorporators, officers, and agents.

Shoup and Schuyler from the beginning knew of the scheme of Henshaw and Fitzhugh. Because of the provisions in their contracts, which gave Henshaw control of Fitzhugh's interest, they secured a ratification by Henshaw of their transaction with Fitzhugh in which he conveyed to the Midwest Oil Co. The document signed by Henshaw expressly mentions his agreements with Fitzhugh of August 15, 1909, and November 16, 1909. The agreements are also mentioned in Henshaw's assignment of his "claim" against Fitzhugh to evidence.

Shoup, Schuyler, and Reed organized the Midwest Co., the Reed Investment Co., also the Crescent Oil Co., Control Oil Co., Bluestone Oil Co., Barbados Oil Co., Pinero Oil Co., Seattle Oil Co., California Oil Co., Fitzhugh Oil Co., and Henshaw Oil Co., commonly called the "Reed companies." They became the principal stockholders, officers, and directors; and had the active management and control of all these companies.

The Midwest Oil Co., which acquired Fitzhugh's interest, is an applicant for leases to 1,970 acres of the field. The Reed companies, which acquired the interest of Henshaw, conveyed to the Wyoming Associated Oil Corporation, an applicant to leases to 5,963 acres of the field. The latter was organized by the same group of promoters, and their knowledge of the fraud was knowledge to this applicant.

The applicants are all subsidiaries of the Midwest Refining Co., all organized by the same promoters and capitalists, all having very largely an identity of officers, stock ownership, management, and control. None of them were strangers to the true situation or innocent purchasers in any sense.

The general rule of law is that notice of a fact acquired by an agent while transacting the business of his principal operates constructively as notice to his principal; and as corporations from their nature can never act except through the instrumentality of agents, this principle applies with peculiar force to them. Notice to or knowledge of an officer or agent of a corporation obtained in the course of his employment, and with respect to a matter within the scope of his authority, or apparent authority, is notice to or knowledge of the corporation. EXCESS ACREAGE

Even should the question of fraud be decided in favor of the applicants, then they are entitled to leases in the Salt Creek field for 3,200 acres only.

Let us examine the so-called relief provision of the act, sections 18, 18a, and 19.

Section 18 provides:

"That not more than one-half of the area, but in no case to exceed 3,200 acres, within the geologic oil or gas structure of a producing oil or gas field, shall be leased to any one claimant under the provision of this section when the area of such geologic oil structure exceeds 640 acres.

"All leases hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant and all persons claiming through or under him by lease, contract, or otherwise, as their interests may appear; subject, however, to the same limitations as to area and acreage as is provided for claimant in this section.

"That no lease or leases under this section shall be granted, nor shall any interest therein inure, to any person, association, or corporation for a greater aggregate area of acreage than the maximum in this section provided for."

Section 18a does not expressly provide an acreage limitation.

Section 19 provided that certain persons shall be entitled to prospecting permits upon "the same terms and conditions and limitations as to acreage as other permits provided for in this act."

The question is, How great an acreage is an applicant entitled to under the act? Was it contemplated that an applicant should be limited to a lease of 3,200 acres within the geologic oil or gas structure of a producing oil or gas field, or that an applicant should be entitled to 3,200 acres under section 18, an unlimited acreage under section 18a, and 2,560 acres under section 19? Of course, the act should be considered and construed as a whole. Undoubtedly the intention of Congress in providing an acreage limitation was to prevent monopoly, to insure competition, and to extend the privileges to the many and not to the few. To accomplish this purpose applicants are limited by the act to a maximum of 3,200 acres. Any other construction would, in effect, invalidate the acreage limitation provisions and circumvent the clear intention of Congress.

The desire to limit the acreage to each applicant is discernible throughout the act. In section 13, the first on "Oil and gas," it is provided that a permit shall be granted to prospect for oil and gas on not to exceed 2,360 acres. Section 14 provides that if the permittee discovers valuable deposits of oil or gas, he shall be entitled to a lease of one-fourth of the land embraced in the permit at a royalty of 5 per cent and shall be entitled to a preference right to a lease on the remainder of the land embraced in the prospecting permit at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent. Section 17 provides that all unappropriated deposits of oil or gas situated within the known geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field and the unentered lands containing the same not subject to preferential lease may be leased to the highest bidder in areas not exceeding 640 acres.

When it comes to section 18, the first of the so-called relief provisions, Congress, in its liberality in extending a preferred right to honest claimants, goes further than in the preceding sections and increases the limitation to 3,200 acres. Section 18a in the original draft of the act in the House was a part of section 18; and it was by an amendment at a late hour of its consideration that it was separated from section 18. All of the provisos of section 18, such as the provision relative to the naval petroleum reserve, the question of frauds, the acreage limitation, etc., were not painstakingly added to 18a; but undoubtedly all these provisions were intended to apply to 18a the same as to 18. In fact, 18a is in a sense another proviso to 18 which authorizes the President to direct the compromise of a controversy by an exchange or division of land (very desirable under certain conditions) or the proceeds of operation. Will the idea be indulged that this section authorizes the President to direct the granting of a lease to a claimant guilty of fraud, or to an unlimited acreage, or that it extends any greater measure of relief in any case than section 18? If so, many of the provisions of the act absolutely are of no avail. It merely authorizes, first, the President to make or direct a settlement, and, second, to make it in a different manner from that authorized by section 18; but it is not intended that such a settlement shall violate the provisions of section 18.

Section 19 is for the purpose of protecting a bona fide claimant who had not made a discovery on or before the passage of the act. It authorizes the granting of prospecting permits to claimants "upon the same terms and conditions and limitations as to acreage as other permits provided for in this act." It further provides, "Where any such person has heretofore made such discovery, he shall be entitled to a lease thereon under such terms as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, unless otherwise provided for in section 18 hereof," clearly indicating that the lease must be granted under section 18 if the facts are such as to bring it within the provisions of that section; and if the claimant already had the maximum under section 18, then, of course, no further lease could be granted. In this connection it is important to note the provisions of section 18: "That no claimant acquiring any interest in such lands since September 1, 1919, from a claimant on or since said date claiming or holding more than the maximum allowed claimant under this section shall secure a lease thereon or any interest therein, but the inhibition of this proviso shall not apply to an exchange of any interest in such lands made prior to the 1st day of January, 1920, which did not increase or reduce the area or acreage held or claimed in excess of said maximum by either party to the exchange." It will be seen that anyone who claimed an area in excess of 3,200 acres should not receive any benefit from the excess, either by obtaining a lease thereon or by the sale thereof, the idea being that a lease or leases on as much as 3,200 acres would be ample relief to any claimant. When the maximum is granted under section 18, surely an additional acreage is not permissible under section 18a or 19.

Let us next consider who these applicants are and what they are asking.

The applicants are "the allied and associated powers." They are closely related by contract, by stock ownership, and by corporate officials and directorates.

By the time oil was being produced in any considerable quantities the Salt Creek field in one way or another had passed largely into the hands of the Midwest Oil Co., the Reed companies, and the "Franco" companies (commonly so called because they were organized and controlled by citizens of France, Belgium, and Holland). These companies, for the purpose of combining their claims and interests into one operating company, early in 1914 joined in organizing the Midwest Refining Co., which in the beginning was made the biggest and most powerful of all the concerns interested in the field. It was made the overlord of the domain by contracts between it and its creators, which in substance gave it the exclusive right for a period of 20 years from January 1, 1914, to possess and mine for oil the lands claimed by these companies, respectively, and to possess and operate all pipe lines, refineries, wells, tanks, machinery, and equipment already installed for the extraction, storage, transportation, and refining of oil.

The Midwest Refining Co. agreed in substance to extract the oil from said lands, transport it to the refineries, refine it, sell the refined products, and to pay said companies one-half of the net proceeds of the refined products of the oil extracted from the lands claimed by them, respectively. These contracts are in reality leases. The result, if not one of the chief purposes of the organization of the Midwest Refining Co., was to secure a complete monopoly of the entire product of the field, and thereby enable it as the creature and agent of the combining claimants to purchase the crude oil produced from the few remaining tracts of the field at the cheapest possible price. The lands of the field not claimed by said combining companies were in the hands of various small operators who, in order to dispose of the oil they produced, were forced to enter into long-term contracts to sell such oil to the Midwest Refining Co. at a price arbitrarily fixed by it. Consequently, no lease to any part of this field can be granted that will not inure to the benefit of the Midwest Refining Co. In fact, a lease to any of the applicants above mentioned is indirectly a lease to the Midwest Refining Co.

ANALYSIS STOCK OWNERSHIP

An analysis of stock ownership will throw considerable light on the respective interests of the Midwest Refining Co. and the applicants:

(a) The Mountain Producers Association owns 52 per cent of the stock of the Wyoming Associated Oil Corporation, an applicant for 5,963 acres. The Midwest Refining Co., by owning 32 per cent of the Mountain Producers Association, is interested in these applications to the extent of 992 acres.

(b) The Salt Creek Producers Association owns 60 per cent (possibly 76 per cent) of the stock of the Midwest Oil Co., applicant for 1,970 acres. The Midwest Refining Co., by owning 32 per cent of the stock of the Salt Creek Producers Association, has an interest in these lands equal to 416 acres.

(c) The Wyoming Oil Fields Co., owning all the stock of the Central Wyoming Oil & Development Co., an applicant for 920 acres. The Salt Creek Producers Association owns all of the stock of the Wyoming Oil Fields Co. and the Midwest Refining Co. by owning 32 per cent of the stock of the Salt Creek Producers Association, has an interest in these applications equal to 924 acres.

(d) The Petroleum Maatschappij Salt Creek applied for lease to 160 acres for the reason that its name had been used in a patent application. It long ago conveyed to the Wyoming Oil Fields Co., whose stock is all owned by the Salt Creek Producers Association; but the Midwest Refining Co., by owning 32 per cent of the stock of the Salt Creek Producers Association, is interested to the extent of 31 acres.

(e) The Salt Creek Consolidated Oil Co. has applied for 2,347 acres, but 50 per cent of its stock is owned by the Wyoming Oil Fields Co., Wyoming Associated Oil Co., and the Midwest Oil Co. The Salt Creek Producers Association owns the Wyoming Oil Fields Co. and 52 per cent of the Wyoming Associated Oil Corporation. The Midwest Refining Co. owns 32 per cent of the Salt Creek Producers Association and the Mountain Producers Association, and is therefore interested in these applications to the extent of 273 acres.

(f) E. J. Sullivan, "trustee," has applied for leases for 560 acres, not disclosing for whom he is acting; by written agreement (not of record), the Salt Creek Consolidated Oil Co. and the E. T. Williams Oil

Co. are each to have one-half of the lands if the leases are granted. As stated under (e), 50 per cent of the Salt Creek Consolidated Oil Co. is owned by the Wyoming Oil Fields Co., the Wyoming Associated Oil Corporation, and the Midwest Oil Co., and that the Salt Creek Producers Association owns 66 per cent of the Midwest Oil Co. The Mountain Producers Association owns 52 per cent of Wyoming Associated Oil Corporation and the Midwest Refining Co. owns 32 per cent of both the Salt Creek Producers Association and the Mountain Producers Association, and therefore has an interest of 32 acres.

(g) The Mountain & Gulf Oil Co. has applied for 960 acres, section 6, township 39 north, range 78 west, and the north half of section 11, township 40 north, range 79 west. The New Brandford Oil Co. (predecessor of the Salt Creek Consolidated Oil Co.) and the Northwestern Oil Co. at one time had an interest in section 6, but we have not the evidence to give the present ownership of this section. The north half of section 11 was leased by the Parkman Oil Co. to B. D. Townsend, one-tenth of the oil being reserved to the Parkman Oil Co. Townsend assigned to the National Petroleum Co., who assigned to the Mountain & Gulf Oil Co., reserving 40 per cent of the net profits. The National Petroleum Co. deeded its interests to the Salt Creek Producers Association. Apparently, then, 10 per cent is owned by the Parkman Oil Co., 36 per cent by the Salt Creek Producers Association, and 54 per cent by the Mountain & Gulf Oil Co. The Midwest Oil Co. owns 95 per cent of the Parkman Oil Co. and the Salt Creek Producers Association owns 66 per cent of the Midwest Oil Co. The Midwest Refining Co. owns 32 per cent of the Salt Creek Producers Association, and therefore has an interest equal to 43 acres.

(h) The New York Oil Co. and the Midwest Oil Co. have applied for 160 acres—the southwest half of section 13, township 39 north, range 79 west. We do not know the facts relative to the interests involved, but have evidence that the New York Oil Co. is now controlled by the Midwest interests.

(i) The New York Oil Co. and the Northwestern Oil Co. are applicants for 480 acres—the southwest half of section 34 and the south half section 1. The New York Oil Co. has a royalty interest of one-eighth in the southwest quarter of section 34, the balance going to the Northwestern Oil Co., which is owned by the Boston-Wyoming Oil Co., and 41 per cent of the latter is owned by the Midwest Oil Co., which would give it 35⅞ per cent interest in this 160 acres. The New York Oil Co. has a 23¼ per cent interest in the south half of section 1. The Midwest Oil Co. has a 10¾ per cent interest plus the 41 per cent of the interest of the Boston-Wyoming, which makes it (sic) total interest in the south half of section 1, 28¾ per cent, or 149.3 acres. The Salt Creek Producers Association, owning 66 per cent of the Midwest Oil Co., would have an interest equal to 98 acres and the Midwest Refining Co., owning 32 per cent of the Salt Creek Producers Association, would have 31 acres.

(j) The National Petroleum Co. has applied for 960 acres formerly claimed by the Parkman Oil Co., who leased to B. D. Townsend, who assigned to the National Petroleum Co. This lease was assigned by the National Petroleum Co. to T. A. Dines, a vice president of the Midwest Refining Co., and we assume that any interest acquired by him went direct to the Midwest Refining Co. The National Petroleum Co. retained a 40 per cent interest. Therefore 10 per cent goes to the Parkman Oil Co., 36 per cent to the National Petroleum Co., and 54 per cent to T. A. Dines. The Midwest Oil Co., owning 95 per cent of the Parkman Oil Co., the Salt Creek Producers Association, owning 66 per cent of the Midwest Oil Co., and the Midwest Refining Co., owning 32 per cent of the Salt Creek Producers Association, plus the Dines share, would have an interest equal to 538 acres.

(k) The Federal Oil & Development Co. has applied for 320 acres, which was leased by it to B. D. Townsend, reserving a royalty of 15 per cent. This lease was assigned by Townsend to the National Petroleum Co., who assigned the northeast one-half of section 13 to T. A. Dines, and the southeast one-fourth of section 13 to the Mountain & Gulf Co., reserving in each instance a royalty of 40 per cent of the net profits. The National Petroleum Co. and Dines then conveyed to the Salt Creek Broducers Association for stock in the latter. Then the Federal Oil & Development Co. holds an interest of 15 per cent, the Mountain & Gulf Oil Co. 25½ per cent, and the Salt Creek Producers Association 59½ per cent, the interest of the latter being 190 acres, of which the Midwest Refining Co. is credited with 32 per cent, or 61 acres.

(l) The Parkman Oil Co. has applied for 160 acres, which it leased October 1, 1915, to B. D. Townsend, reserving a 10 per cent royalty; Townsend assigning to the National Petroleum Co., and it assigned to T. A. Dines, reserving 40 per cent of the net profits. The National Petroleum Co. and Dines then conveyed to the Salt Creek Producers Association, the Midwest Oil Co. owns 95 per cent of the Parkman Oil Co., the Salt Creek Producers owning 66 per cent of the Midwest Oil Co., and all the interest of the National Petroleum Co., and Dines has an interest of 154 acres, of which 32 per cent, or 49 acres, is credited to the Midwest Refining Co.

By using the above-mentioned percentage of stock ownership, the acreage applied for by the respective claimants, and the total acreage applied for, we compile the following:

CONCLUSION

The paramount reason urged by the applicants in support of their claims is that they innocently and in good faith have expended vast sums in the development of the field, but the true facts render this contention impotent, because almost all the capital used, not only for development but also to purchase claims, was the money received for the oil taken by these trespassers from the public lands. So resourceful were these promoters and capitalists that at no time did they risk any considerable part of their own means. They let the property pay for itself and for its development. It will be remembered that the Fitzhugh claims were secured by an agreement to purchase the oil to be produced at 33 cents per barrel, only $10,000 in this case being advanced, and that the Henshaw claims were purchased for $325,000, but this consideration was not paid till it was derived from the oil. Any other capital that was used very largely came from France and Holland.

The crowd asking such valuable concessions at the hands of the Government already have become immensely wealthy at its expense. They have no equities worthy of consideration. It is true that stocks have been sold to the public, but surely the Government should not sacrifice the public property, a greatly needed natural resource, to make these oil stocks good.

The Midwest Refining Co. has an absolute monopoly of the Salt Creek field, and in one way or another controls every one of the above-named applicants. It is interested in every acre sought by them, and a lease to any one of them will inure to its benefit. Its claims are based on titles that are thoroughly saturated with fraud, and from the beginning its promoters, officers, and directors unquestionably have had full knowledge of the fraud. It not only is not acting honestly and in good faith, but it now is compounding fraud by seeking to secure leases on a greater acreage than the maximum allowed by law. For several years it maintained a large force of paid lobbyists, lawyers, and agents at the Capitol to secure the passage of the act with the relief provisions included, and evidently it will continue so to do till its subsidiaries have secured leases thereunder. They are not "in the court with clean hands."

When the leasing bill was before Congress it was emphatically asserted and maintained that the Standard Oil Co. had no interest whatever in the Midwest Refining Co. or the applicants, and that it was not concerned with the relief provisions, but now it is conceded that the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana absolutely controls the Midwest Refining Co. Only a little while ago the Government was courageously engaged in "dissolving" the Standard Oil Co., but now it is requested to dispense relief to this object of charity and to bestow upon it leases to the most valuable known oil acreage in the world—public property of the value of at least $1,000,000,000. Is this the character of claimant Congress intended to relieve?

The relief provisions extend rights and privileges to claimants which they did not have under the preexisting law and enable them to take advantage of claims they could not establish or defend in the courts; therefore the law very justly confines the relief to honest claimants and limits them to leases on a maximum of 3,200 acres.

This matter demands the most careful consideration, and under the circumstances leases should not be granted on an ex parte showing, but a hearing before the register and receiver of the local land office in Wyoming should be ordered, so that all the evidence pro et con may be taken, a complete record made, presented, and fully considered before a final action is taken.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT C. BELL,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

JANUARY 18, 1921.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the action of the House of Representatives insisting on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 39 to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 39 to the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion of the Senator from Utah shall be adopted, will that displace the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the question before the Senate is in the nature of a message from the House of Representatives, and that makes it privileged.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand, of course, that the receipt of a report of a conference committee is privileged; but this, as I understand, is a motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report, which is not privileged.

If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I will call attention to Rule XXVII, which reads:

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

Then it becomes the business before the Senate, and, of course, will retain its place as such until disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that paragraph 7 of Rule VII provides as follows:

The Presiding Officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate, any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

The pending motion refers to a message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Chair advise us what the nature of the message is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the message.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 19, 1929.

Resolved, That the House further insists on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39 to the bill (H. R. 15089) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The motion is not relevant to the message, which simply advises us that the House disagrees to the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 39 to the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but that brings up for consideration, does it not, the original bill?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his point of order.

Mr. MOSES. This being a conference report presented, and a motion made to proceed with its consideration, the question is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that this is only a message from the House of Representatives and is not itself a conference report.

Mr. MOSES. Did not the Senator from Utah present a conference report?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah made a motion that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 39.

Mr. MOSES. What has become of the existing conference? Does not this relate to the Interior Department appropriation bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It relates to the Interior Department appropriation bill, all the amendments to which have been agreed to except amendment No. 39.

Mr. MOSES. The bill has been in conference nearly all winter, has it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It has been in conference for quite a while. It was taken back to the House, and, as I stated this morning when I made the motion, the House voted 304 to 28 against the amendment. We have been in conference for a long time; I have tried in every way in my power to get the House to yield. It will not yield; and, that being the case, rather than see the bill fail, I have made the motion that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 39.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the very question now. What is the status of that motion? That, of course, presents for consideration the appropriateness and the wisdom of the Senate amendment to the House bill. Now, the question is, Does that motion displace the unfinished business, and is that now the business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that it does not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to say that the discussion of this matter will take considerable time.

Mr. MOSES. Very well, let us proceed with its discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be necessary to have it, sooner or later, or else let the bill fail.

Mr. MOSES. We might as well have it now.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We might as well let the bill fail one way as another. The question is whether the Senate, whenever the House disagrees to its views, shall simply subside and let the House have its way, which really means in this particular case, as well as in most questions arising on an Interior Department appropriation bill, that Mr. CRAMTON shall have his way.

Mr. MOSES. I am of the opinion, Mr. President, that the matter comes here in rather a difficult form. If it had come here in the form of a conference report, the procedure would have been very simple, but it having arisen in the form in which it has, and the Chair having made the ruling which he has just made, I do not see why we might not as well proceed now with the discussion of the question, under the motion made by the Senator from Utah, as to let it wait until some other time in the session. Of course, I am not unmindful of the implied threat contained in what the Senator from Montana has said with reference to the time which it will take, because I am fully aware that the few remaining days of the session should be consumed as I have seen them consumed on previous occasions somewhat similar to this.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the matter can be very readily solved.

Mr. MOSES. In what way?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By the Senate promptly rejecting the motion made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. MOSES. And let the bill fail?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let the bill fail. The responsibility is not on this House any more than it is upon the other.

Mr. MOSES. But whether the Senate wants to take the responsibility——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me give this information to the Senate, and to the Senator from New Hampshire for his enlightenment, upon the situation. The only matter in controversy is the question whether the Senate amendment, which strikes out a provision of the bill giving to the Secretary of the Interior full authority to condemn as he pleases any land in the national parks, shall be retained.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from New Hampshire is familiar with that because he sat in the chair during the prolonged and illuminating discussion which was carried on here in regard to it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thank the Senator, but something has transpired since, of which the Senator from New Hampshire is, perhaps, not so fully advised.

Let me say, Mr. President, that the argument is made that the great trees in the Yosemite Park are imperiled unless this legislation shall be immediately enacted; that the owners of the lands upon which these valuable trees grow are about to cut the timber. I put a telegram and a letter in the RECORD a week or 10 days ago from the owners of these lands saying that they had no such purpose whatever.

Mr. MOSES. I recall it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then the Senate conferees proposed to the House conferees to make the provision in relation to the condemnation applicable only to the Yosemite Park, which would take care of the trees there. That was rejected.

The Senate conferees then proposed to the House to make the provision applicable to all timberlands in all of the parks—that is to say, giving the Secretary of the Interior power to condemn any lands in any of the parks chiefly valuable for the timber. That proposal was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment in order that I may ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I take it for granted that the Senator wishes at some proper time to extend his remarks quite largely. I ask if it would be agreeable to him to suspend now, in order that I may take up an appropriation bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; just as soon as I finish this statement. I wish to make just a few further remarks to show the situation to the Senator from New Hampshire and the rest of the Senate.

The Senate conferees then proposed to the House conferees that the provision be made applicable to timberlands in all of the parks. That was rejected.

They then proposed that the provisions for condemnation be made applicable to all lands except those occupied by homes, and that was rejected.

Now the thing simply stands as a controversy between the two Houses as to whether the Secretary of the Interior shall be given power to condemn homes in the national parks.

Mr. MOSES. Without any reference to the subject matter involved, I will say to the Senator from Montana that that is not at all a unique position for conferees on the part of the House to take. They have become increasingly insistent in recent years upon having exactly their way or legislation would fail.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, just in that connection I may add that the House conferees are proposing right now and have determined right now to let the first deficiency bill fail because they are asked to comply with their five-times-repeated promise to take a certain matter back to the House for a recorded vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I have done everything that it was possible for me to do to secure an agreement upon this one amendment. The Senator has recited the circumstances just exactly as they have taken place. Finally we had to decide this question, or else the bill would fail, so I said to the chairman of the House conferees, "I am not going to ask the Senate of the United States to recede on this amendment unless the matter is taken back to the House and there is a vote of the House—not a standing vote, as you had before, but a yea-and-nay vote of the House—upon this one proposition." The only way to do that was to have the House reject the report, and have the matter come back here for a conference, and have us reject it and send it back to them, so that they could get a yea-and-nay vote. That was done, and on Monday the vote was taken on this one amendment, and the vote was 304 against the amendment and 28 for it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me interrupt by saying, however, if the Senator will permit me, that the House never has been apprised by anybody of these various proposals of compromise between the members of the conference committee. Its Members are voting upon the matter just as it was originally, without any suggestion of a change at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand from what Mr. CRAMTON says that they were fully aware of the amendment, because of the fact that the Member from Montana introduced in the House a bill on the subject, and the bill was voted upon in the House in about the same proportions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was quite a different matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only saying what was reported to me by the conferees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair make a suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I agreed to yield to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Wyoming desires to take up an appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well; then I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I deplore the fact that we are in this terrible condition here; but I desire to caution Senators that we shall have to swallow a whole lot of legislation that we do not like, because the 4th of March is just ahead of us, and we shall have to adjourn then, and all this legislation will die; and, in accordance with the usual thing that happens every two years, we must overlook a lot of jokers and a lot of bad things and let them go into the law in order that we may be prepared for adjournment on the 4th day of March.

I hope, therefore, that Senators will not take up the time in quarreling over a controversy which, after all, is only a method of procedure; and in the interest of haste, in order that we may get as much done as we possibly can by the 4th of March, I ask that the motion be taken up, unless otherwise disposed of, and voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair make a suggestion in the interest of time? If the Senator from Utah will withdraw his motion for the present, the message from the House may lie upon the table, and then the Senate may proceed with the bill the consideration of which is requested by the Senator from Wyoming. The Senator from Montana then will have preserved all of his rights.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall make that request, then; but I want it distinctly understood that the conference report is lying on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Utah may be renewed at any appropriate time.

The Senator from Utah withdraws his request; the message from the House lies upon the table, and the Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the temporary laying aside of the unfinished business in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of H. R. 17053, the legislative appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to object. I simply wanted to add to what I said a while ago, that if we can induce the great political leaders in the country, and particularly in the House of Representatives, to agree to the constitutional amendment that the Senate has passed four times doing away with the "lame-duck" sesssion of Congress, we will never get into this difficulty again.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, some of the "lame ducks" we have here are the brainiest men here.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I desire to add to what I said that there is something more involved here than the particular question presented by the Senator from Montana. If this body has one particle of self-respect left it should and will put an end to a literally intolerable condition.

There are one or two people in another House who insist upon controlling the legislation of this body. I want to say that in my judgment the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has done everything he possibly could do in reason to meet this situation; but this is not the only situation. As I have already indicated, the great deficiency bill has practically been abandoned, and the avowal has been made that it will be abandoned because conferees are unwilling to keep faith with their own House, and, in the face of a promise five times made, refuse to carry a bill back for a yea-and-nay vote.

In the 30 years that I have been a Member of one or the other of these Houses there never has been such an exhibition of moral timidity and such a defiance of the authority of this body.

I have nothing to say as to the merits of this question. I should not like to see the Interior Department bill beaten upon a question of this sort; but, as I have indicated, it has resolved itself into a question of the right of this body to legislate and to assert its power and its dignity. I want to say, furthermore, that it is going to be very difficult, if not impossible, to get through this body before the 4th of March another deficiency appropriation bill embodying every provision of that which has been abandoned except the one provision objected to by House conferees.

The conferees of the other House were assured that if they would comply with their promise, five times made, and have a yea-and-nay vote over there, the matter could be settled in conference in 15 minutes thereafter, regardless of the result of the yea-and-nay vote; and they rejected even that suggestion.

So far as I am concerned, I have never indulged in a filibuster for three minutes in my life; but I think it is time that the Senate of the United States ought to let another branch of Congress know that it is the Senate of the United States and can not be controlled by one or two contumacious Members of another body.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17053) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I say now that we have three appropriation bills yet unacted upon. It takes time to have conferences, even when all are in good temper. There are perhaps some indications of bad temper, as my colleague on the committee has stated. In my judgment we should pass these three appropriation bills early enough so that they can go through conference and be carefully considered, and the result of the conference reported to this House.

Of course, it is nothing to me personally whether these bills fail or whether they pass, so far as I am pecuniarly concerned; but I have some pride in the fact that we are not only ready and willing to do our duty here but that we can actually accomplish it, and there should be no delay upon any one of these three bills.

The one that I ask to take up now I do not believe will take 15 minutes, because we have made scarcely any amendments so far as the amount of money is concerned, and only perhaps half a dozen amendments of all kinds.

So, Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the bill may be read for consideration of the committee amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments first. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there not a request for unanimous consent to take up the conference report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; that has been laid aside. The motion of the Senator from Utah was withdrawn, and the message from the House of Representatives lies upon the table. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent has been asked and granted for taking up the legislative appropriation bill. A unanimous-consent request is now pending for dispensing with the formal reading of the bill, and reading the bill for action on the committee amendments only. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read. Some of us have not had a chance to see what it contains.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the formal reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

THE CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution which simply seeks information from one of the departments of the Government, and before the resolution is read I ask that a telegram be read from a newspaper called the Chief, which is devoted to civil service and the promotion of the competitive civil-service system.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, unless the matter leads to debate, I will yield.

Mr. WAGNER. If it leads to debate, I will ask that the resolution go over after it is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will read the telegram.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to say, for the benefit of the reader, that the words "The Chief" refer to a newspaper of that name.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 18, 1929.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate:

The Chief, in the interest of honest enforcement of the Federal civil service law, appeals to you in behalf of the large number of men and women who competed in civil-service examinations conducted by the United States Civil Service Commission for positions in the Prohibition Bureau. Notwithstanding the fact that eligible lists were established in August, 1928, almost two years after the law took effect which placed the Prohibition Bureau under civil service, those in charge of the Prohibition Bureau in various parts of the country, particularly in the city of New York, have failed to make all the appointments from said eligible lists, thus ignoring the act of Congress of March 3, 1927, placing these positions in the competitive class. In disregard and defiance of said law those in charge of the Prohibition Bureau have appointed persons without qualifications for the positions in question presumably for political reasons and as political patronage. Therefore The Chief urges that you introduce a resolution in the Senate of the United States so that an investigation of the entire matter can be had. As an outline we suggest the following points for development:

1. Why the eligible list for prohibition agent was never made public.
2. The names of temporary incumbents who have been retained in office in violation of the act of Congress of March 3, 1927.
3. The names of those appointed from the eligible list.

4. Causes for the delay in establishing civil-service eligible lists and reason for holding three examinations for prohibition agent.

5. Amount of money spent on examinations for Prohibition Bureau and amount paid in salaries in violation of the civil service law.

Unless this situation is corrected the merit system, in so far as the Federal civil service is concerned, is a farce and a mockery. The Chief appeals to you as Senator from the State of New York, where many of the violations referred to have occurred, to assist in correcting the conditions.

THE CHIEF,
FRANK J. PRIAL, Editor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from New York?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. WAGNER. I ask that the resolution be read for the information of the Senate. I understood that unanimous consent had already been granted me for the reading of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator from New York is correct. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 332), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Civil Service Commission be requested to inform the Senate on or before March 4, 1929, concerning the following matters:

(1) The reasons for the failure to publish lists of eligibles for appointment to the field service of the Bureau of Prohibition.

(2) The names of all persons employed in the field service of the Bureau of Prohibition who have not been appointed pursuant to the provisions of the civil service laws as contemplated by the act of March 3, 1927, entitled "An act to create a Bureau of Customs and a Bureau of Prohibition in the Department of the Treasury."

(3) The names of all persons employed in the field service of the Bureau of Prohibition who have been appointed pursuant to the provisions of the civil service laws.

(4) The sums expended for examinations held for appointment to the field service of the Bureau of Prohibition.

(5) The total amount of salaries paid to employees of the field service of the Bureau of Prohibition not appointed or retained pursuant to the act of March 3, 1927, entitled "An act to create a Bureau of Customs and a Bureau of Prohibition in the Department of the Treasury."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over, under the rule.

Mr. WAGNER. Was objection made to its present consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] objected.

UNIFICATION OF RAILROADS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that on Saturday, as soon as the Journal is read, if we adjourn on Friday, I shall address the Senate upon the bill (S. 5817) to authorize the unification of carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, at which time I shall make a report from the Committee on Interstate Commerce on the bill.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have here an able and interesting statement by former Senator Robert L. Owen, of Oklahoma. He is discussing the recent action of the Federal Reserve Board. No Member of Congress had more to do with creating the Federal reserve banking system than did Robert L. Owen. He is one of the authors of that great system. I ask unanimous consent that his statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York World, Wednesday, February 20, 1929]

COAUTHOR OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT ACCUSES BOARD OF USURPING POWER IN ITS DRIVE FOR CURBING OF CREDIT

By Basil Manly

WASHINGTON, February 19.—The action of the Federal Reserve Board in issuing its blast against excessive speculation was unwise, unnecessary, and unjustified by the condition of the Nation's industry, commerce, and finance former Senator Robert L. Owen, of Oklahoma, one of the authors of the Federal reserve act, said to-day.

"The remedy chosen by the Reserve Board," says Senator Owen, "may produce conditions more serious than the disease which they are seeking to cure.

"The board's admonition may curb speculation by destroying the confidence of the trading public in the existing market and in the credit situation. But there is a real danger that its warning may have the effect of producing a totally unwarranted lack of confidence in the fundamental stability of our industrial and commercial structure and thus create a depression which is totally unjustified by the present condition of business.

"I do not believe," continued the former Senator from Oklahoma, "that it is a part of the functions of the Federal Reserve Board to attempt to regulate and control the use which American citizens make of their money and credit. If they choose to utilize their credit in stock-market speculation, they do so at their own risk.

DUTY OF THE BOARD

"It is, of course, the duty of the board to protect the reserves of the system and to use the machinery with which they have been provided by law to maintain them in sound condition. An examination of the latest available reports on brokers' loans shows clearly that these loans are not based upon credit secured from the banks but are largely financed with credit loaned by corporations and individuals.

"The report for February 15 shows that the loans made by the New York banks for their own account amounted to only $1,097,000,000 and the loans for the account of out-of-town banks amounted to $1,859,000,000. This is a total of less than $3,000,000,000 for the account of all banks and is only slightly more than half of the total brokers' loans outstanding. The loans made by the banks on stock-market collateral are now substantially the same as they were a year ago, when the Federal Reserve Board officially assured the Senate that there was no reason to be concerned about the situation.

"The New York Stock Exchange and the minor exchanges in other cities perform a legitimate and useful function in providing a market where citizens may at any time buy and sell securities at a definitely ascertainable price. That there have been abuses connected with the operations of these exchanges is true. It is also true that the present prices of certain securities may be much higher than the earnings of those corporations warrant. Radio stock, for example, has reached heights which have amazed the officers and directors of that company. The future may or may not justify these present quotations, but certainly it is the business of nobody except those who are doing the trading.

"Any attempt by the Federal Reserve Board to force deflation of the stock market," Senator Owen declared, "is as unjustifiable as would be action on its part to stimulate the market artificially."

CALLS ACTION UNWISE

"The present action of the board seems to me as unwise as the drastic deflation policy which it instituted in 1920, which led to the depression of 1921," Senator Owen declared with emphasis. "As early as the summer of 1919 I registered with the board my protests against the policies which it was pursuing and warned it of the disaster which was certain to follow. When these private communications failed to alter the board's policies I took the matter to the floor of the Senate and forecast the agricultural and business depression which would inevitably result from such deflationary policies. In a few months my prophecies were exceeded by the terrible conditions which came upon the country. Agriculture was prostrated, 3,000 banks failed, great industries were forced to liquidate their stocks of commodities in a falling market and some of the greatest financial institutions in the country were for a time imperiled.

"The Federal reserve system was created to provide the Nation with an elastic currency and credit, and not to act as a regulator of industry, commerce, finance, or speculation. The board should limit itself to its legitimate and proper functions—safeguarding its own reserves and those of the member banks—and leave whatever speculative fever may have seized upon the country to run its natural course."

"Do you believe," the writer asked, "that the action of the board in maintaining low interest rates during the latter part of 1927 and a part of 1928 in order to assist the Bank of England and other European central banks in reestablishing the gold standard was responsible in any large measure for the development of speculation in this country?"

INTEREST RATES IGNORED

"No; I do not," replied the Senator. "Exhaustive studies by the Harvard School of Business Research and other authorities have proved that interest rates do not control stock-market movements. Easy money will not make a bull market. The dullest markets usually are found when interest rates are at rock bottom. I believe that the action of the Federal reserve system in cooperating with the central banks of Europe for the purpose of enabling them to put the fiscal systems of their respective countries in sound condition was highly desirable, and I do not believe that the maintenance of low rediscount rates during that period had any appreciable effect in promoting speculation in this country."

"What do you consider the greatest defect in the present operation of the Federal reserve system?" the writer asked.

"One of the fundamental defects, which must be apparent to all, is the fact that the system is primarily under the control of the sellers of credit," was the reply. "The Bank of England is governed by a board made up of merchants and other large users of credit. The policy of the Federal reserve system, on the other hand, is primarily controlled by the class A directors, who are bankers, and who naturally look at the situation from the standpoint of those who sell credit rather than from that of those who use it. I believe that it would be wise and desirable for American merchants, manufacturers, and other business executives to have a larger voice in the control of the system."

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR BROWNVILLE, NEBR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4861) authorizing the Brownville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Brownville, Nebr., which were, on page 3, line 11, to strike out "twenty" and insert "five"; on page 6, after line 3, to insert:

SEC. 8. All contracts made in connection with the construction of the bridge authorized by this act and which shall involve the expenditure of more than $5,000, shall be let by competitive bidding. Such contracts shall be advertised for a reasonable time in some newspaper of general circulation published in the States in which the bridge is located and in the vicinity thereof; sealed bids shall be required and the contracts shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. Verified copies or abstracts of all bids received and of the bid or bids accepted shall be promptly furnished to the highway departments of the States in which such bridge is located. A failure to comply in good faith with the provisions of this section shall render null and void any contract made in violation thereof, and the Secretary of War may, after hearings, order the suspension of all work upon such bridge until the provisions of this section shall have been fully complied with.

And on page 6, line 4, to strike out "8" and insert "9."

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments. I make this motion at the request of my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] who is ill and unable to be present.

The motion was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to present for the consideration of the Senate some observations concerning what has come to be known as the Philippine question. I am led to a brief discussion of this matter because it is understood that Congress will soon be convened in extraordinary session for the purpose of enacting a tariff law, and attempts will be made to incorporate therein provisions seriously affecting the Filipinos.

An extensive propaganda is being carried on in the United States in favor of either limiting the amount of sugar produced in the Philippine Islands which may be brought into the United States or imposing a tariff upon all sugar imported into the United States.

In 1916 the policy of the United States with respect to the Philippine Islands was announced in an act, "To declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands."

The act contains this language:

Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the war with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and

Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without in the meantime impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence.

Following the language which I have just read are provisions relating to the government of the Philippine Islands. When this bill was under discussion it was understood that the Philippines were soon to have their independence.

It is true there were some imperialists in the United States who insisted that the Philippine Archipelago should be held for exploitation and that the Filipinos should be treated as a conquered race. Those entertaining this view were unwilling to extend the provisions of the Constitution to the Filipinos or to incorporate their country into the United States. This view assumed that there was no inconsistency in a republic such as this holding colonial possessions and subjecting the inhabitants thereof to military rule. They repudiated the position of Senator Hoar and other patriotic Americans, who protested against the conquest of the Philippine Islands and the adoption of a policy looking toward holding them as a colonial possession for an indefinite period. Those who contended for the independence of the Filipinos in that memorable contest during and immediately following the war with Spain were unsuccessful in having their views adopted. But as the years went by the American people perceived that it was not in harmony with American ideals and with democratic institutions for an alien race to be subjected to military control and to have imposed upon it a government not of its own choosing.

It soon became apparent that the Filipinos, with their different traditions, customs, language, and culture, were unwilling to become a part of this Republic, and regarded with resentment the suggestion that their land should be held as a territorial possession, and that they should be subject to any form of government—military or otherwise—which the United States willed to impose upon them.

There never has been a time since American military forces landed upon Philippine soil that the Filipinos were willing to be an American colony or even an American State. They have desired to be free and independent; they have had confidence in their ability to govern themselves and to maintain an independent and sovereign state, possessing a liberal form of government and adequate to protect its people and discharge its international obligations.

I believe that a majority of the American people regarded the Jones Act, from which I have read, as a solemn pledge upon the part of the American people to grant independence to the Filipinos.

It can not be contended that the declaration contained in the Jones Act, that "it has always been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government would be established therein," is ambiguous or meaningless; and I sincerely hope that it will not be urged that it was made for the purpose of deceiving the Filipinos, if not the people of other countries.

The United States can not afford to be insincere or to indulge in sharp practice or to trifle with a proud and progressive people. The Philippine Islands belong to the Filipinos, not to the United States. They are demanding that this Government redeem its promise and withdraw its sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and recognize the independence of the Filipinos. They have demonstrated their capacity for self-government; they have a stable government; they have made progress and are advancing in a satisfactory manner along the pathway of national development and intellectual and moral progress.

I regret to say that there are unmistakable evidences that the party in power intends to disregard the pledges made by the United States and to hold the Filipinos under American control, and at the same time deny to them the rights of American citizens. They are to be treated as outside the Constitution and to be denied constitutional guaranties and constitutional protection, and are not to be permitted to set up their own government and to be a free and independent people. The letter and the spirit of the Constitution are to be violated in order that the Philippine Islands, thousands of miles away, may be held as a colonial possession and its inhabitants subjected to unconstitutional and un-American rule.

Mr. President, I protest against any course that would subject this Republic to the charge that it had violated its plighted faith; that it was guilty of Punic faith; that while professing the principles of democracy and the right of self-government it had refused independence and freedom to an alien people who were competent to govern themselves and coveted only the liberty and freedom to which the people of the world are entitled.

It is apparent that within the past few years the party in power has exhibited a less liberal attitude toward the Filipinos, and has been seeking pretexts for refusing to grant them the independence which they covet and to which they are entitled. President Coolidge made it clear in a statement prepared by him a short time ago that the Filipinos need not expect independence in the near future. I think the statement, properly interpreted, was the announcement of a backward and reactionary policy, and was intended to advise the Filipinos that the promises contained in the Jones Act would not be redeemed, and that their aspirations for independence were not to be realized, at least for many years to come. This statement was a rebuff to the Filipinos. It was a challenge to their requests for independence. It was equivalent to a declaration that the United States was under no obligation to withdraw its sovereignty or to permit the Filipinos to establish their own government.

I have offered measures in the Senate providing the necessary steps to be taken for the redemption of the promises made to the Filipinos. I have asked the Senate upon various occasions to grant independence to the Filipinos, to enact legislation that would enable them to call a constitutional convention in order that the fundamental law which is to be the basis of their government might be prepared. All appeals have been in vain. The majority party has not only indicated its purpose to prevent such legislation but it has signified its intention to enact laws that would fasten more powerfully the grip of the United States upon the Filipinos.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Has the Committee on Territories held hearings on this subject?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there have been hearings in the House and in the Senate dealing with the question of independence for the Filipinos. As stated a moment ago, I have offered measures providing for the calling of a constitutional convention and for the adoption of such procedure as would bring about the withdrawal of American sovereignty from the Philippine Islands and the establishment of an independent government by the Filipinos. There were hearings upon one of my bills by the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions of the Senate.

Mr. DILL. When was that?

Mr. KING. My recollection is that it was about four years ago.

Mr. DILL. There have been no hearings since then?

Mr. KING. As I now recall, the last hearings upon the measure to which I have referred were in 1924 or 1925. There have been hearings upon some other bills since that time. These bills, however, were as interpreted, for the purpose of conferring upon the United States additional authority, and were intended to further restrict the liberties and independence of the Filipinos.

Mr. DILL. Was a vote taken upon reporting the Senator's bill?

Mr. KING. My recollection is that no official vote was had in the committee. There was opposition to it and all efforts to secure a favorable report were abortive. I was not a member of the committee but appeared before it, and also had the opportunity of presenting witnesses who testified at some length, and conclusively demonstrated that the measure which I offered was just and fair and that the Filipinos should have independence and were competent to govern themselves and to set up and maintain a stable and progressive republic.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I was a member of the committee at the time. The Senator will recall that the committee had progressed so far in the discussion of the subject in 1924 that they had really gotten down to considering the number of years in which they would agree to give independence to the Filipinos. I recall that there was considerable discussion as to whether independence should be granted the Filipinos within 5 or 10 years after the enactment of the legislation then under consideration. As I recall the situation, the Senate committee never made a report before the Congress adjourned.

I would like to ask the Senator if it has not been his observation that the longer we are postponing action on this question of independence for the Filipinos sentiment seems to be steadily increasing against independence? My observation is that there is less sentiment in favor of Filipino independence in the Congress to-day than there was when I first came here, and it seems to be getting less and less each year. Has that been the Senator's observation?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hesitate to criticize my associates in this body or those engaged in legislation at the other end of the Capitol. I regret, however, to be compelled to confess that the tide of opposition to Filipino independence is stronger to-day than it was a number of years ago. American capital has been invested in the Philippine Islands and many Americans have been diligent in spreading propaganda against independence for the Filipinos and in favor of the United States holding the Philippine Islands indefinitely. A number of American capitalists have reported that the resources of the Philippine Islands are very great, and that their retention by the United States would be of material and financial advantage to the American people. I remember that one American business man spoke about investing $100,000,000 in acquiring land and in developing a certain industry. It is known that Americans have large investments in cane-sugar lands and in sugar factories, and that those who are investing their capital in the Philippine Islands are insisting that independence shall not be granted to the Filipinos.

I think the Senator from Massachusetts is correct in his statement that there is less sentiment in favor of withdrawing our sovereignty from the islands than there was a number of years ago.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is my observation.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Is it not a fact that that is due to the increasing amount of capital invested in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly the large investments by Americans have had much to do with the development of a sentiment hostile to Philippine independence. Some Americans undoubtedly desire that the United States hold the Philippine Islands for economic exploitation. They see in them a profitable field for American investment. They are not concerned in the political and moral problems involved; nor have they much concern in the aspirations of the Filipinos for independence. Undoubtedly they are patriotic Americans, but some can not comprehend that Filipinos can be patriotic and possess passionate longings for a free and independent nation. There are some Americans who seem determined to regard the Philippine Islands as a mere accessory to American business. They insist upon American goods being admitted free of duty into the islands. There are others who are demanding that, while we force free trade, so far as American products are concerned, upon the Filipinos, we may impose tariff duties upon their products which are brought to American shores.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, at the present time we are confronted with proposals to exclude certain of their products, although the islands are under our flag. This is particularly true of sugar.

Mr. KING. The Senator is correct. The proposition will be submitted to Congress to impose a tariff upon Philippine sugar. Another proposition is to restrict the amount of sugar which may be brought from the Philippine Islands to the United States.

These propositions are regarded by many Americans as being contrary to our theory of government, if not at variance with the principles of justice and morality which should govern the United States in its dealings with peoples under its control. The view is urged by some that the Constitution does not follow the flag; that the United States may conquer distant lands and alien peoples and hold them as subjects, denying to them the rights which we enjoy. This policy is not democratic. It finds no place in our political institutions or the political philosophy by which Americans should be governed. Persons worthy to live under our flag are worthy to enjoy all constitutional guaranties. This great Republic can not afford to embark upon imperialistic policies. It would weaken our institutions, corrode the spirit of liberty and democracy which should guide our lives and determine our national policies. Lincoln perceived that the United States could not exist half free and half slave. This Republic can not be imperialistic and at the same time preserve its integrity, its ideals, its democratic institutions.

We must have a democratic republic, and if we depart from the ideals and the spirit of a government of that character, and embark upon the tempestuous sea of conquest, of colonial possessions, of imperialism, economic or otherwise, the work of our fathers will be in danger and the foundations of this Republic imperiled.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions of the Senate. The committee reported two years ago, I think it was, at the time Senator Willis was chairman, a bill to carry out the pledges made to the Filipinos. I am for turning them loose myself, and so voted in the committee. Those people have increased their sugar production in the last eight years from 40,000 tons to over 500,000 tons, and that sugar is competing with our sugar, and there is no status for those people. I am perfectly willing to turn them loose. As a matter of fact, I do not believe any naval officer or any Army officer will claim that we could hold those islands at the initiation of any war we might enter into. We would lose them, and have to sacrifice human life and treasure to regain them. There is no reason for us to carry out the pledge we made to them.

So far as the question brought up by the Senator from Washington is concerned, I propose, when the proper time comes, to ask that we tax every pound of sugar that comes from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is in error in his statement that two years ago the committee of which he is a member voted to give independence to the Filipinos. There were measures before the committee of which Senator Willis was chairman, but I have no recollection of my measure which called for Philippine independence or any other similar measure being favorably acted upon. There were measures reported by the committee which sought to increase the power of the Governor of the Philippine Islands and to provide a special fund to furnish him with experts and fiscal aid. I am glad the Senator favors the withdrawal of American sovereignty from the Philippine Islands, and I feel sure that he will join with those in the Senate who are seeking to redeem the promises made by our Government to grant independence to the Filipinos.

I desire to state, however, to the Senator that in my opinion we can scarcely defend the policy which forces the Filipinos under American rule and denies to them the right to export their products free of duty to the United States.

It seems to me violative of the Constitution and unjust, if not immoral, to hold the Filipinos as a conquered race; to treat them as aliens and then exploit them; to force upon them our products and deny to them the right or opportunity to ship their products to our shores.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator know whether or not there has ever been any diplomatic representation to other countries, particularly Japan and England, proposing that a joint protectorate be established over the islands and they be given their independence?

Mr. KING. Upon a number of occasions I have introduced resolutions authorizing and directing the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with all powers having territorial interests in the Pacific and adjacent thereto with a view to agreeing upon a treaty under which the independence of the Philippine Islands would be recognized. The Senator is familiar with the treaty guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium which was signed by Germany, Great Britain, and France. When I first introduced the bill for Philippine independence I offered at the same time a resolution of the character just indicated.

Mr. President, I have made some inquiry in regard to this matter and it is my opinion that all powers who have interests in the Pacific would willingly join with the United States in a treaty which would bind the signatories to a recognition of the independence of the Filipinos and pledge them to respect the territorial integrity of the Philippine republic. Indeed, Mr. President, I believe if it were desired by the United States, the terms of the treaty would go further and afford guaranties for the protection of an independent Philippine government. I have made some investigations concerning this matter, and I have no hesitancy in saying that the Pacific powers would not look with disfavor upon an independent government in the Philippine Islands, and that neither would look with covetous eyes upon the territory of the new government set up.

Mr. DILL. Such a treaty should remove the objections which are raised as to their status.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly a treaty of the character indicated would be of advantage to the Filipinos and would remove the objections of those who desire that the Filipinos shall have independence, but are not free from apprehension as to the security of the Philippine government against aggression from some other power. I have often heard the statement made that if the Filipinos were granted independence the islands would quickly fall a prey to Japan.

Mr. President, such statements are without foundation, and I regard them as most unjust to Japan. There is not the slightest evidence indicating a desire upon the part of the Japanese Government to acquire the Philippine Islands or to exercise control over the Filipinos. As a matter of fact, at one time Japan had a foothold in, if not control over, the Philippine Archipelago but voluntarily relinquished such control.

It is worthy of note that though the Japanese population is increasing at the rate of nearly 700,000 per annum, there has been no inclination to find in the Philippine Islands homes for the Japanese. Only a very limited number of Japanese resided in the Philippine Islands when they were partly, if not entirely, under the political control of Japan, and during the past hundred years, notwithstanding, as I have stated, Japan's rapid increase in population, only a few thousand Japanese have gone to the Philippines. Under American control there have been no bars against Japanese immigration, and yet there are only 5,000 or 6,000 Japanese among the 11,000,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

My recollection is that there are fewer Japanese in the Philippines now than there were 25 or 50 years ago. The climate does not suit the Japanese. They are looking toward the mainland of Asia, not to Polynesia or to the Philippine Islands. China has no designs upon the Philippines, nor has Great Britain, France, Germany, or Holland, or any other country. This Republic is the only nation that seems to covet the Philippine Archipelago, and the American people, or at least a portion of them, seem to be the only people who are unwilling that the Filipinos should have their independence.

Mr. President, if the President of the United States should enter upon negotiations with the countries referred to, I have no doubt that within a short time a treaty could be negotiated which would afford all the guaranties that the Filipinos might desire, and that would give to us every assurance that no other power would attempt to conquer the Filipinos or obtain from them privileges and favors of a special and discriminatory character. And the Filipinos, if we should grant them independence, would be so grateful that they would repel any suggestion that some other nation should obtain special favors or benefits. If we shoud redeem our solemn promises and permit them to have their own government they would regard this Republic with an affection that would bind them as with hooks of steel to this Republic.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Will it disturb the Senator if I interrupt him at this point?

Mr. KING. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has stated something upon this subject upon which I would like to have a little more light, not because I doubt his statement but because I would like to have it get as much publicity as possible. How long has it been since Japan has had some control over the Philippine Islands?

Mr. KING. I do not recall definitely, but it was several centuries ago.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator heard of anything of a substantial nature which would indicate that there is anything to the argument made against the freedom of the Philippine Islands on the ground that Japan would immediately lay claim to the islands?

Mr. KING. I have made diligent inquiry, not only in the United States but in other countries, with a view to ascertaining whether there was anything to indicate that any country or government coveted the Philippine Archipelago or had any purpose, if independence came to the Filipinos, to molest them or attempt to annex any of their territory. It has been my privilege to meet leaders of Japanese thought, as well as a number of leading Chinese who were in a position to judge the aims and policies of the Chinese. I have also spoken with representatives of European nations concerning various problems, including the question of Philippine independence and the future of the Filipinos. I failed to discover a scintilla of evidence indicating that if the Filipinos were given their independence they would be molested by any nation or their independence interfered with in the slightest degree.

It is true that I found among some a feeling of skepticism concerning the promises made by the United States to give independence to the Filipinos. I met some persons who did not hesitate to say that they believed that the United States would never relinquish its grasp upon the Philippine Archipelago. But among those who expressed this view there was nothing to indicate that if the promises of the United States were fulfilled and the Filipinos were given their independence that their country would be in danger of invasion from any quarter.

An examination of the situation in the Pacific and in the Orient will, I feel certain, justify the conclusion which I have reached and the statements which I have made. China has troubles of her own and for many years to come will be occupied in working out her own internal problems and consolidating any gains that may be made in social, industrial, and political fields.

The evidence is conclusive that China never coveted the Philippine Islands and, though the closest neighbor, made no attempt whatever to colonize the Philippines or to acquire political influence therein. Holland, interested as she has been for centuries in island possessions not far remote from the Philippine Archipelago, has never evinced any interest in the Philippine Islands or indicated any purpose to acquire or control them. France with her interests in China has never looked with envious eyes upon the Philippine Islands. And Germany, when she was a powerful factor in the western Pacific, was indifferent to the Filipinos and their island possessions. Great Britain, with her large interests in the Pacific, never sought control over the Philippine Archipelago, and notwithstanding the proximity of these islands to Australia, neither Great Britain nor any of her colonies manifested any desire to control or acquire the Philippines.

I have referred to Japan. I repeat when I say that Japan, though she acquired Formosa, and under the treaty of Versailles obtained a mandate over two or three groups of small and unimportant islands in the Pacific, was wholly indifferent to the Philippines. As I have said, at one time she dominated them, but was not sufficiently interested in holding or controlling them to remain.

I regret that there have been so many unjust and wanton attacks in the American press upon Japan. Even in this body I have heard serious charges made against Japan, her good faith, her national honor. I have upon a number of occasions defended Japan against what I believed to be unwarranted and unjust criticism. I have called attention to her problems, to her insular position, to her precarious situation with China and her teeming millions, and Russia with her enormous population and her great resources blocking the way to expansion in perhaps the only direction where it is possible for Japan to go.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that it seems to me the objection to the freedom of the Philippine Islands is almost discourteous to the Government of Japan, especially if it is made, as I believe it is made, without any foundation in fact for the making of it. I have not made the same investigation that the Senator has, at least not nearly so extensive, but I have never heard or seen anything from a reliable source that would indicate that there is any truth in the statement whatever, yet continually it is offered in this country. It is really a criticism against a friendly nation, and it seems to me it is unjust.

Mr. KING. I am in accord with the views just expressed by the Senator. I believe that it is an unwarranted and unjust attack upon Japan to say that she nourishes a secret ambition and purpose to acquire the Philippine Islands. I have referred to the fact that, though the resources of Japan are limited and her arable land is wholly inadequate for the needs of her people, she has not encouraged them to colonize the Philippines, nor has she attempted to secure any foothold—economic, military, or otherwise—in any part of the Philippine Archipelago. Japan realizes that her future is dependent largely upon industrial development and that any expansion must be in the direction of the mainland. She recognizes that there is no opportunity for her surplus population to secure lands in North America or in Australia. There is the island of Sakhalin lying to the north, and a part of which belongs to her, which is susceptible of development and will be available for further colonization.

But Chosen and Manchuria and the Asiatic mainland will be the avenues into which the Japanese will enter after Japan has reached the saturation point. Let us not, therefore, Mr. President, offer excuses and false pretexts for refusing to perform a solemn obligation—the liberation of the Filipinos from American rule. I called attention a few moments ago to the fact that I had offered a resolution with reference to the negotiation of a treaty with Pacific powers to secure the independence of the Filipinos. Since I have been speaking I have had the Secretary of the Senate bring to me a copy of the resolution which I offered in the Senate in December, 1925. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States by the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," vested in the Philippine Legislature, created by said act, general legislative power with respect to the Philippines, in order that by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers the people of the Philippines might become prepared to assume the responsibilities and enjoy the privileges of complete independence; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States in said act expressly declared that it was the purpose of the Government of the United States to withdraw its sovereignty from the Philippine Islands and to recognize the independence of the islands as soon as a stable government should have been established therein; and

Whereas in conformity with the provisions of said act, a stable government, founded upon principles of political liberty and upon popular franchise, has been erected in the Philippine Islands and is exercising political powers therein, subject only to the powers vested in the Governor General of the Philippines and other officials appointed by the President of the United States, and certain supervisory powers exercised by the Secretary of War, and the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from final judgments and decrees of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President enter into negotiations with the powers having territorial interests in the Pacific, or adjacent thereto, for the purpose of concluding a treaty or treaties whereby said powers agree to recognize the Philippine Islands as an independent state, and covenant to respect the political independence and territorial integrity of such Philippine state, when such state shall have been established and declared by the United States.

If the administration's refusal to carry out the provisions of the Jones Act and withdraw our sovereignty from the Philippine Islands rests upon the assumption that Philippine independence would be menaced by Japan, the falsity of such assumption can quickly be established by entering into negotiations with Japan, together with other Pacific powers, for concluding a treaty under the terms of which the signatories thereto covenant to respect the political independence and territorial integrity of such Philippine state.

Mr. President, I think that the obstacle to Philippine independence is not Japan or China or any government on earth except this Republic. The greedy eyes of some American capitalists see in the Philippine Islands a rich field for exploitation. Under the pretense of a broad humanitarianism and a desire to protect and civilize the Filipinos, they proclaim with great vigor that the United States must hold the Philippine Islands, and govern them not under the Constitution but outside of its beneficent provisions.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the constant asseverations that we are not imperialistic, there are more than symptoms of imperialism in our attitude toward and treatment of other countries. There is economic imperialism as well as other forms. American capital is flowing in golden streams from the borders of the United States. Enormous investments are being made in Haiti, Santo Domingo, Cuba, Nicaragua, and various countries of South and Central America, the Philippine Islands, and in other lands and climes. Large investments are being made in Cuba. Sugar plantations are being developed in the Philippines by American capital, and important American interests are acquiring control of resources which will strengthen the grip of the United States upon them.

(At this point Mr. KING yielded to Mr. BINGHAM to present a conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.)

Mr. KING. When I was interrupted by the conference report I was referring to the important investments being made in the Philippine Islands and the economic control which is being obtained by American capitalists. Undoubtedly there are some benefits to be derived by large investments of foreign capital; but there are also resulting evils and dangers the extent of which may not always be foreseen. American capital is being invested in Haiti.

If aliens are permitted to acquire land in Haiti, within a few years those who were formerly landowners will be wretched tenants and peons. It is a menace to the security and prosperity of a country having a large population and a limited area of land to permit foreign capital to acquire large landed estates. The agrarian problem is not a new one. In Italy and in other countries in centuries past slavery followed the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few and the control of the arable lands by the rich. In the long run it will be highly disadvantageous to the Filipinos if foreign capital controls their resources and alien landlords acquire large holdings of agricultural lands. Undoubtedly temporary advantages will result from an invasion of foreign capital; there may be temporary booms and superficial prosperity, but finally the day of reckoning will come. If the mass of the people work for foreigners, foreign capital will suck the stream of prosperity from the land. It were better for the conscience of the American Nation and for the preservation of American ideals if we do not hold the Philippine Islands for economic exploitation. It will be better for us and better for the Filipinos if we give them their independence. It will be to our everlasting honor if we can say to the world, "We have aided in setting up another republic and unfurling another flag to float over a free and independent state in the great blue that envelops this little world of ours." Mr. President, let us redeem our promises and take steps looking to the liberation of the Filipinos!

I have referred to measures which I have introduced providing for the withdrawal of the United States from the Philippine Islands. I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to one of the bills which I offered dealing with this question. On the 6th of December, 1927, I offered the following bill, which I ask the clerk to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 711) providing for the withdrawal of the United States from the Philippine Islands

Be it enacted, etc., That in conformity with the act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," approved August 29, 1916, the Philippine Legislature is hereby authorized to provide for a general election of delegates to a constitutional convention, which shall prepare and formulate a constitution for an independent republican government for the Philippine Islands, and that upon the ratification and promulgation of said constitution and the election of the officers therein provided for, and as soon as the government provided for under said constitution is organized and ready to function, the President of the United States shall recognize and proclaim the independence of the Philippine government under said constitution and shall notify the governments with which the United States is in diplomatic correspondence thereof, and shall invite said governments to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands, and that the President is directed to withdraw the military forces of the United States from said islands within six months after said proclamation recognizing the independence of said Philippine government.

That the debts and liabilities of the Philippine government, its Provinces and municipalities and instrumentalities, which shall be valid and subsisting at the time of the approval of the proposed constitution shall be assumed by the government established thereunder.

That if the Philippine government fails to pay any of its debts and liabilities referred to in the foregoing section or the interest thereon when due, the United States Government may thereupon take over the customs offices and administration of the same and apply such part of the revenue received therefrom as may be necessary for the payment of such overdue indebtedness or interest. When such overdue indebtedness, liability, or interest shall have been paid the United States Government shall restore to the Philippine government the control and administration of its customs offices and the revenues derived therefrom.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the last paragraph of the bill does not accurately express my views. I inserted it, after having drafted the bill, out of deference to the views of some of my colleagues who shared with me the conviction that the time had come for the United States to withdraw from the Philippine Islands. However, they were of the opinion that some of the opposition to the bill would be overcome if provision were made which would assure the payment of all obligations of the Philippine government which had been incurred while the control of the Philippine government was in the hands of the United States.

Senators will recall that since the United States has been in control in the Philippine Islands bonds aggregating millions of dollars have been issued, the proceeds derived therefrom being devoted to internal improvements and governmental purposes. The interest upon these bonds has been promptly met; the provisions of the sinking fund have been scrupulously observed, and there is no reason to doubt that the bonds as they mature will be promptly cared for, whether the United States retains control of the Philippine government or the Filipinos are given their independence. But to meet the views of skeptics I consented to insert the provision referred to, which gives to the United States the right to take over the customs offices and their administration in order to meet any debts and liabilities incurred when the United States was in control of the government if there shall be default in meeting such obligations.

Mr. President, there are nearly 12,000,000 Filipinos inhabiting scores of beautiful islands in the Philippine Archipelago. All of them are Christians except approximately 800,000, who are Mohammedans. They are a unit in asking for independence. Every member of the Philippine Legislature, whether Christian or Mohammedan, whether elected by the people or appointed—as a few of them are—by the Governor General, is asking that American sovereignty be withdrawn and that the Filipinos be permitted to set up a republican form of government. Though they appreciate the strength and power of this Republic and appreciate the benefits which they have derived from American control, they possess national aspirations and are discontented with alien rule.

In a speech which I delivered in the Senate about two years ago I stated in considerable detail the economic, industrial, educational, and political conditions prevailing in the Philippines. I showed the large number of schools with nearly a million children attending them; the progress which had been made in education; the agricultural development; the large number of landowners; the natural resources which constitute a reservoir from which the future may draw for material advancement and the welfare of the people. I referred to the interest taken by the people in political matters, the zest with which they entered into public affairs, and the manifold evidences of their capacity for self-government.

I shall not traverse the same ground at this time or enter into details in regard to these questions. I shall only say in a general way that the Filipinos have a stable government; that they have demonstrated their ability to build a commonwealth, to maintain law and order, and to carry forward liberal and progressive policies that will insure the stability of the state which they may be permitted to organize. It is quite likely that when they shall have independence they will encounter many obstacles and perhaps make serious mistakes. What nation has been free from mistakes? Our own Republic has encountered difficulties and has been torn by civil strife. The difficulties and dangers and problems encountered will be tests of their capacity and ability. These national problems and dangers are schoolmasters indispensable to national growth and material and moral advancement.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Does not the Senator think that we had a perfectly good title to the Philippine Islands in the first instance?

Mr. KING. I am unwilling to concede that our title was the best or entirely free from taint or imperfection.

Mr. BRUCE. It seems to me it is the best title that one country ever did have to the soil of another one.

Mr. KING. By conquest, yes; if conquest confers the best title—a fee-simple, indefeasible title—using the words of lawyers with respect to land titles, then perhaps the United States does have, if not the best, at least a title which will defeat some other country claiming the Philippines.

Mr. BRUCE. Not only by conquest, but by purchase as well. It was a dual title, it seems to me. First, title by conquest, and then title by purchase.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the question of our title to the Philippine Islands was learnedly discussed when the treaty of Paris was before the Senate and when Congress was considering what it would do with the Philippine Islands and what form of government it would impose upon the Filipinos. The views of the Senator from Maryland were accepted by many who contended, as the Senator has, that the United States had conquered the Philippines and driven Spain from the islands and had subsequently acquired Spain's title by payment of $20,000,000. Perhaps under the accepted principles of international law the United States does have some form of title to the Philippines. If it be conceded that a nation may make war upon a people and conquer them, and thus acquire title to their country, then there is a basis for the claim that we have a good title to the Philippine Archipelago; and if we accept the doctrine that the defeat of a nation by a more powerful one, and the defeated nation has certain dominion over distant lands and peoples and by its defeat has lost its control and has the legal right to deed away or barter away those lands and peoples, then perhaps the United States has an additional source of title.

Under that view the Turks acquired title by cruel war to Armenia, to the Byzantine Empire, to the territory out of which Rumania and the Balkan States have been carved. By the sword it held control for centuries over Christian races, over Slavs and Hellenes and representatives of the Aryan race. Spain conquered the Filipinos several centuries ago. She imposed upon the Filipinos a cruel and despotic rule. There was a century or more of intermittent strife. Revolution followed revolution, the Filipinos seeking to throw off the foreign yoke and to set up a government of their own choice. Spain held similar title to Cuba and other countries which she lost. Did Spain have a good title to the Philippines? I deny it. Did she own the Philippines? I repudiate the suggestion. Rizal, the last great Philippine martyr, saw the coming independence of his people.

Spain's rule in the Philippines was ended before American troops landed upon the shores of the Philippines. The Filipinos set up a government and were proceeding to organize a new state. They were free from Spanish rule. They were an independent people. Spain had no title to convey to the United States. The $20,000,000 which we paid to Spain for the Philippines and the Filipinos gave us no title. It is true we asserted title under the pretended grant from Spain, and it is true that we waged war against the Filipinos and defeated them, and superimposed upon them American rule. For years it was a military rule. Little by little the harshness of this rule was softened, and finally under the Jones Act the Filipinos were given a liberal, autonomous government.

No one can deny that we made war upon the Aguinaldo government, which was not only a de facto but a de jure government. It represented the will of the Filipino people. It was functioning as a government and discharging its obligations.

Mr. President, I can not believe that we obtained title by purchasing the Filipinos at $2 a head. Spain had no title to the Filipinos; she could not sell them; we could not buy them. I do not believe we can get title to human beings by paying money for men, women, and children.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he thinks there would have been any insurrectionary movement in the Philippines that would have amounted to anything but for the prospect of American intervention?

Mr. KING. I have no hesitancy in answering in the affirmative. The Senator will recall that there was insurrection in Cuba; that there had been numerous revolutions in this Pearl of the Antilles, covering a period of more than 100 years. There were revolutions in the Philippines synchronizing with Cuban revolutions. The revolutionary movements, both in Cuba and the Philippines, were often crushed; but from the ashes of defeat rose patriotic Cubans and Filipinos who raised the standard of liberty and rallied their countrymen to renewed assaults upon the Spanish Government. For a number of years preceding the Spanish-American War the fires of revolution had been burning in the Philippines. The struggle in Cuba undoubtedly strengthened the resolve of the Filipinos to achieve their independence, and it is certain that if the United States had not engaged in war with Spain the Filipinos would have thrown off the Spanish yoke and set up an independent government.

Mr. BRUCE. It seems to me the real question is whether our hands are tied by the Jones Act.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator, he means that if it were not for the Jones Act we would have the right to remain in the Philippine Islands indefinitely.

Mr. BRUCE. That is the inquiry I am suggesting.

Mr. KING. With profound respect for the views of the Senator, I must express my dissent from his position. I agree that the Jones Act binds us to withdraw from the Philippine Islands and give the Filipinos their independence. But I contend that, without the solemn promise contained in the Jones Act, it is the duty of the United States to withdraw from the Philippines and return to the Filipinos the control of their own country. I think there is a moral question involved which transcends in importance any legal question. When we deal with human rights, with the liberties of peoples, legal formula must not stand in the way of justice and liberty and the rights of humanity. We have been led to believe that a new day is dawning; that the right of self-determination exists and that the inarticulate masses of the world have a right to be heard. I know there is a school of philosophy and there are historians who take the view that upon this little globe there must be a few strong and powerful nations, controlling, directing, and protecting the smaller states. They see the United States controlling this entire hemisphere, and Europe under the control of two or three powerful nations. The movement toward concentrated authority and concentrated wealth is most powerful, and the gravitational forces now in operation throughout the world, in the political and industrial world, give emphasis to the philosophy to which I have referred and seem to support the views of its exponents. But I believe that a different philosophy must prevail; that there must be decentralization of authority, a diffusion of power as well as a diffusion of wealth. There are changes undoubtedly resulting from the groupings of numerous small states and weak peoples around some powerful political sun, but the welfare and happiness of humanity will best be realized under dual forms of government rather than a unitary system. Small states have performed important functions and have made contributions of incalculable value to the freedom and happiness and progress of the world. We must not return to the days of autocratic government; to the rule of powerful states which exercise dominion over distant lands and alien peoples. Rather must we encourage democracy, a spirit of liberalism, the development of smaller units, the recognition of the individual as the real vital unit, and the most important factor in the social, political, intellectual, and moral development of the world.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland, I think, must concede that the Jones Act does tie our hands, to use his expression. Permit me to read a statement of Theodore Roosevelt which contains his interpretation of the promise or pledge contained in the Jones Act. He said:

> In order to use the Navy effectively we should clearly define to ourselves the policy we intend to follow and the limits over which we expect our power to extend. Our own coasts, Alaska, Hawaii, and the Panama Canal and its approaches should represent the sphere in which we should expect to be able, single handed, to meet and master any opponent from overseas.
> I exclude the Philippines. This is because I feel that the present administration has definitely committed us to a course of action which will make the early and complete severance of the Philippines from us not merely desirable but necessary. I have never felt that the Philippines were of any special use to us. But I have felt that we had a task to perform there and that a great nation is benefited by doing a great task. It was our bounden duty to work primarily for the interest of the Filipinos; but it was also our bounden duty, inasmuch as the entire responsibility lay upon us, to consult our own judgment and not theirs in finally deciding what was to be done.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. How does the Senator think we should deal with those parts of the Philippine Islands which do not desire independence, which prefer to continue under American rule?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator, I submit, is in error in assuming that there are any parts of the Philippine Islands which do not desire independence or which prefer to continue under American rule. The fact is that the Filipinos are a unit in desiring independence. I stated a few moments ago—perhaps the Senator was not in the Chamber—that there was not a single representative in the Philippine Legislature who was not earnestly in favor of Philippine independence. The Senator knows that the Governor of the Philippine Islands is given the authority by act of Congress to appoint some of the members of the Philippine Legislature. But even the governor's appointees join with all other members of the legislature and vote with them in favor of Philippine independence. I aver that there is no sentiment in the Philippine Islands among the Filipinos in favor of American control over the archipelago.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator think that if they obtained their independence they would be able to preserve it as against the encroachments of the other parts of the Philippines? Because, as the Senator, of course, knows, traditional animosities have existed between the different races of the Philippines for generations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I admit that there are animosities, though not so deep-seated nor so important as the Senator's statement would imply. But these animosities are forgotten in the universal demand for independence. The Senator knows that in Mexico there are many tribes speaking different languages. There are animosities among the Mexicans, and yet I think it will be conceded by all that in no part of Mexico can be found those who would tolerate even the suggestion of foreign control in Mexico.

The Yaqui and other tribes of Indians, the inhabitants of Yucatan, and the numerous divisions and groups of Mexicans with racial and tribal differences and animosities, speak one language when the question of independence of their country is involved.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Did the Senator from Maryland ask if there were animosities among the different tribes in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that I went all over the Philippine Islands, into every nook and corner of them, last year. I found no animosities among the people over there excepting those that were being stirred up by a few Americans, who stirred them up just for the purpose of trying to show the United States that we ought to keep hold of the islands.

Mr. BRUCE. I thought there were quite bitter animosities for generations between the Moros and Filipinos.

Mr. WHEELER. There have been, but they have been practically done away with. I went down to the Moro settlements, down in Mindanao and all through there, and there were no animosities to amount to anything at all. The Moros and the Filipinos get along together. It is true that when Mr. Carmi Thompson, of Ohio, was sent over there by the President of the United States, there was an attempt to line them up on different sides of the road; but if you talk to most of the Moro leaders down there they will tell you that they are getting along peaceably.

Mr. BRUCE. That is very interesting, because it helps to clear up some difficulties that have occurred to me in connection with the Philippine independence. I have always been inclined to the view that the thing for us to do was to do what we did in Cuba, to get out and to let them run their own government.

Mr. WHEELER. As I said a moment ago, I went all over the Philippine Islands, went clear down to Jolo, where the Moros are, and went to Mindanao, and most all of the intelligent leaders down in Mindanao and in Jolo told me that they would not have any difficulty in getting along together. But there has been opposition to independence on the part of some Americans who are over there, who want the United States to keep those islands because of the fact that they think it means more to them and their property is worth more if they do. But another influence that is working in the Philippine Islands against independence is certain British interests; at least, some of the British do not want us to grant independence. They do not want us to give the Philippines their independence because of the effect it would have upon India and their other holdings in their spheres of influence.

Mr. BRUCE. Great Britain has large commercial interests in the Philippines, too?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; Great Britain has large commercial interests in the Philippines. As one Britisher said to me, "The United States can not give the Philippines their independence. If you do, it just means that the next thing India will want her independence." That is uppermost in the minds of Great Britain, that if the United States says to the people of the Philippine Islands, "We are going to give you your independence," then it will encourage the other people of the Orient to want their independence.

I heartily concur in what the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has said. We had some very interesting experiences. If the Senator will pardon me, as a matter of fact, there were a large number of Congressmen, and one of them in particular was very bitter against the independence of the Philippine Islands until he himself went over there, and I might say to the Senator that he voted against it, but he completely changed his mind when he got over there and saw what the real situation was.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not true that quite a good many have changed their minds the other way?

Mr. WHEELER. That may be true, too. I could not speak as to that, because I do not know about that; unless it might be that the Senator from Connecticut has changed his mind.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Connecticut changed his mind on the Monroe doctrine; he may have changed his mind as to the Philippines.

Mr. BRUCE. What does the Senator from Montana think would be the likelihood of Japan taking possession of the Philippines in case we retired from the islands?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think they are any more likely to take possession of them than they would be now. Frankly, if we were going to give them their independence, I would feel that we ought to enter into some kind of a treaty with Great Britain and Japan to guarantee the Philippine Islands their independence.

Mr. BRUCE. Then we would have all the risk of the present situation without any of the advantage.

Mr. WHEELER. We would not have any risk if we entered into some understanding with them.

Mr. KING. I may say to the Senator that I discussed that question before he entered the Chamber. I stated that I offered resolutions expressing it as the sense of the Senate that the administration should negotiate a treaty with Japan and all powers interested in the Pacific for the neutralization of the Philippine Islands.

I feel certain that the powers interested in the Pacific would not hesitate to negotiate a treaty which would recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands and bind the signatories to the treaty to respect this territorial integrity.

Mr. BRUCE. If we should retire, just what reservations does the Senator think we ought to make for our national protection?

Mr. KING. I have heretofore discussed one of the provisions of the bill which I offered, which gives the United States the right to take possession of the customhouses in the event the Philippine government defaulted in meeting obligations incurred while the United States controlled the Philippine government. I may say that leading Filipinos made no objection to this provision or reservation, with their knowledge of their country and its resources, and with their understanding of the people and their confidence in their capacity to maintain an orderly and stable government, they are confident that all obligations will be met and the honor and credit of their country will be preserved. Another suggestion has been made, and representative Filipinos have expressed their willingness to have it embodied in a formal instrument connected with the withdrawal of the United States and the setting up of an independent government. The suggestion is that the United States may have such naval bases as it desires in the Philippine Islands and also suitable cable and radio stations.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator think the Philippines would be willing to give us any trade or commercial guaranties?

Mr. WHEELER. They would be perfectly willing.

Mr. KING. I have not discussed this question in any detail with representatives of the Philippines. Speaking for myself, I would not be disposed to require or even suggest that the United States be given advantages in trade and commerce over other countries. Perhaps I should modify this generalization and say that there might be a situation which would result in mutual advantages to the two countries, which would warrant some special agreement or treaty the execution of which would not be unfair to other countries or jeopardize in any way the perpetuity of cordial and friendly relations between the Philippine Government and other governments. I have no doubt that the Filipinos would feel so grateful to the United States that they would be willing to enter into any agreement that would be just and right, looking to the development of trade between the two nations.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say that I discussed the matter with a number of leading Filipinos while there, and as a matter of fact I am sure I could say to the Senator from Maryland that they would be delighted to make almost any kind of a concession that the United States Government wanted, even though they considered it absolutely unfair.

I want to say to the Senator further, I am not at all sure but that, looking at it from the standpoint of the Filipinos themselves, it is not better that the Government of the United States should be over there, but looking at it from the standpoint of an American citizen, it is inconceivable to me that the people of the United States would want to keep the Philippine Islands, except those Americans who are located in the Philippine Islands. I can readily understand why they want us to stay there. They feel that it enhances the value of their property, and they can get cheap labor over there and ship their products back.

Mr. BRUCE. It looks as if I might be able to reconcile my views as to this Philippine situation with the views of the Senator from Montana and those of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say—and I shall not take more than a moment, because there are appropriation bills waiting, and I do not desire to delay the argument for more than a moment—in view of what the Senator from Montana has said, and in view of the fact that he and I went to the Philippines about the same time, my own visit being a few weeks after his, I can not let all that he said go without the challenge that at some future time I may venture to disagree with him in most of what he has said. I would like also to add this, that from the best information which I am able to secure, the situation with regard to the desire of the Filipinos for independence has changed very greatly since he and I were there. In fact, one of the Delegates from the Philippines, Mr. Gabaldon, who went home from the United States last year in high dudgeon because he was not satisfied with the progress being made toward independence, and ran on a platform declaring for the securing of complete independence, was defeated on that platform, and the best information which I could secure is that the leading Filipinos to-day do not desire independence as they did at a time when the propaganda was most active.

Mr. KING. The Senator's information, I respectfully submit, is inaccurate. His statement concerning Mr. Gabaldon is, I feel sure, quite incorrect. The facts are that Commissioner Gabaldon resigned in order that he might seek the nomination for the Philippine House of Representatives. He departed from Washington for his home in March, 1928, while Congress was in session, and pending the consideration of the so-called Willis-Kiess bills, which provided for an increase in the power of the auditor for the Philippine Government and also increased the salaries of the Governor General and other officials. The Filipinos were very much opposed to these measures. In the contest for election to the Philippine Legislature he was charged by his opponent with having left his post of duty in Washington. On this single issue Commissioner Gabaldon was defeated. His opponent was then governor of the Province of Neuva-Ecija; and he was, and is, in favor of Philippine independence. In the local election campaign the question of Philippine independence was not an issue, for both the majority and minority political parties in the Philippines are committed to immediate, complete, and absolute independence for the Philippines.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say that the Senator knows, no doubt, that the president of the senate, Mr. Quezon, and all of the leaders over there, are still advocating independence, and there has not been any change.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not at all mistaken.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would like to ask the Senator a question which has often been in my mind when considering the Filipino problem. If we were to grant independence to the Philippines, would the Senator think it incumbent upon the American Government, in keeping with their independence, to assure them an extension of the Monroe doctrine, generally speaking?

Mr. KING. No. We might by treaty with other nations having interests in the Pacific agree to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of the new government. And it is possible that with such nations the independence of the Philippine government might be guaranteed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator feel that if we were to give them independence our obligation would cease definitely, and that we would retain no other relation than that we bear to France or England or Australia or Canada?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would not go that far. Undoubtedly the United States would have an interest in the new government which it had aided in establishing, and would regard with interest, if not with solicitude, its progress and development. We would undoubtedly regard as unfriendly any act which would be an attack upon the integrity of the new republic, and it is quite likely strong representations would be made to any government that assumed a hostile or unfriendly attitude toward the Philippine government. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I referred to the resolutions which I offered directing the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with all powers having interests in the Pacific for the purpose of securing an agreement or treaty under the terms of which the signatories thereto would agree to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of the Philippine government. As I stated a moment ago, the powers, including those entering into such a treaty, might be willing to guarantee the protection of the Filipinos against any government seeking the overthrow of their government. The Senator will recall that the United States has agreed to protect the Republic of Panama, and under the Platt amendment we may have obligations with respect to Cuba.

Personally, as I have stated, I see no danger to the independence of the Filipinos from any foreign power. In my opinion, when we withdraw from the Philippines and an independent government is established, the Filipinos need have no fear that any foreign power will attack them or seek the overthrow of their government.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator. In my mind, in the consideration of this problem, always there has been the thought of what would happen if that were done, and without that being considered in conjunction with the question of Filipino independence I do not think we have the whole picture. The Senator has partially answered my question and I thank him.

Mr. KING. I call the Senator's attention to the statement made by Theodore Roosevelt—and his views are shared by naval experts—that the retention of the Philippine Islands by the United States is a source of weakness to us instead of strength. We are not permitted under treaties which we have entered into to fortify the Philippine Islands, and if some naval power with a strong fleet operating in the vicinity of the Philippines should attack Manila we could not defend the Philippine Islands. This would particularly be true if the attacking fleet had a naval base near the Philippine Archipelago. The Philippine Islands, therefore, are of no benefit to the United States, materially or otherwise. If we give them independence and extend friendly counsel in the days of their youth, they will be so grateful and so much attached to this Republic that we will derive greater benefit from trade and commerce than we now enjoy, and no other country would supplant us in their affection. So if material advantages are sought by the United States, they will sooner be realized through Philippine independence; and the moral advantages which we will derive will prove of immeasurable value. The world will acclaim our course and peoples everywhere who now criticize because they fear we are imperialistic will be disarmed and will add their voices to the chorus of praise and good will which I feel sure will be heard in all parts of the world. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the 4-power treaty to which the United States, Great Britain, Japan, and France are signatories will be a protection to the Philippine Islands; and doubtless it would be construed, or, if not so construed, supplemented so that the Philippines will be brought within its protecting terms.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has referred to a treaty which he suggests should be entered into between the United States and various Pacific powers having for its object an obligation to respect the independence of the new Philippine state. I would like to ask the Senator whether the treaty he refers to would be put into operation prior to the granting of the independence?

Mr. KING. In my view they should be contemporaneous. As stated, I believe that the powers referred to would be perfectly willing to sign a treaty of the character indicated. It would, of course, rest upon the fact that the Philippine Archipelago is to have an independent government. If it were signed before the independence were granted, it would not, of course, be effective until an independent Philippine government were established.

Mr. TYDINGS. In considering this problem I have wondered whether or not, if we were to grant the Filipinos independence, and they were to be attacked after they had independence, we would then be called upon to help defend their territory, and whether or not the granting of independence would probably lay them open to attack; in other words, even though I might theoretically be in favor of the thing called "independence," if I felt that in the long run it would do the Filipino people an injustice, that it would lay them open to attack from some outside source, I would be inclined not to give them their independence, not because I was opposed to the idea but because I believed it would be bad for the Filipinos and bad for ourselves if they were permitted to get into the condition where they would be subject to an attack from a stronger nation, so that instead of getting independence they would become the vassals, so to speak, of some other nation that might not deal with them as kindly as the United States probably intended to do when we took control of the islands.

I would like to say to the Senator that I believe that idea is in the minds of many other Senators who feel kindly toward the idea of Philippine independence, but are afraid of some of the things which might happen if it is granted to the Filipinos, and it is very difficult for us to vote on this question because the possibilities make it a thing with so many different ramifications, whereas if it were simply the matter of Philippine independence most of us, I believe, would be inclined to look on it with a great deal more favor than possibilities which we can imagine permit us to look upon it now. If we were assured that the Filipinos would not be worse off under independence than they are now, I feel that I myself would be inclined to go along with the Senator to the full extent, but I am a little afraid perhaps that something might happen that would make me regret the action.

Mr. KING. With all due respect to the Senator, I submit that his argument is one which has been made by strong nations in justification of their continued control over conquered nations. A powerful nation which controls a weak nation finds many pretexts for denying the latter liberty and independence. The claim is not infrequently made by a nation which has imposed its will upon a people that some other nation is lying in wait to devour them if they are given their independence.

It is my opinion—and I have expressed it several times during this discussion—that if the Filipinos are given their independence there will be no foe to menace them; no government which will seek to conquer them. It may be, as the Senator has suggested, that the Filipinos would derive greater material benefits—at least for a number of years—if they remained under the control of the United States. Undoubtedly there are advantages flowing from the present connection between the United States and the Philippines. But it is certain that material advantages not now enjoyed would come to the Filipinos if they were an independent nation. But there are questions that rise above material benefits and advantages. It is quite likely that some of the small European states would enjoy commercial and other benefits superior to those which they now possess if they were a part of some adjoining state. There are many individuals who would enjoy greater prosperity if they walked under the wing of some powerful financier and business magnate. I repeat, material things are not the choicest things in life. There are moral and spiritual values that rise above all earthly values. There are great souls who have more happiness and joy in the knowledge of some great truth, in the possession of an artistic soul, than others who possess millions.

The Filipinos, like many other peoples, have aspirations—longings for independence. They see other peoples, fewer in number, who have set up enduring and progressive states and who enjoy the prestige resulting from citizenship within a state of that character.

When the flag of the United States was raised over Chapultepec after our forces had won great victories, we did not say that we will remain in Mexico and govern her as an American possession or province. We did not argue that if we withdrew some other power might be tempted to invade Mexico and despoil her of some of her territory.

Mr. President, this argument does not justify our Government in imposing its will upon the Philippine Islands, or the right to govern a country which has been subject to our military control. It is not a democratic argument; it is incompatible with the spirit of republican institutions and with the genius of our Nation.

This argument has been made by Great Britain with respect to some of her possessions. It was made by Rome concerning her conquered colonies. It will be made again by powerful nations when they seek to justify their conduct in denying liberty and independence to nations and people brought within the circle of their power.

Mr. TYDINGS. I must admit that the Senator's remarks are not without a great deal of logic. I would like just to add this word, however, that the situation with reference to the Philippines is not entirely parallel to the situation in reference to Mexico.

Mr. KING. We may not always find a parallel, but we often find analogies. But the Mexican illustration is more than an analogy. It certainly affords an object lesson.

Mr. TYDINGS. We do know that a nation near the Philippines has taken a great deal of territory unjustly from another nation, where it is expanding and sending its excess population; and having that precedent before me I am wondering whether or not it might not be in the better interests of the Philippines to look a little more carefully into the question of her independence than would be necessary were this condition which I have mentioned not present.

Mr. KING. The argument which the Senator is making against independence for the Filipinos was made by Lord North and by others of the Tories in the Parliament of Great Britain against granting independence to the Colonies. They were afraid that France might seize the infant colonies and subject them to its rule. I say it is the argument always made by a strong nation that has imposed its authority by force upon a weaker nation.

Mr. TYDINGS. In some cases the strong nations have actually seized the weaker nations.

Mr. KING. Granted. That is one of the unfortunate conditions in the development of humanity.

Mr. TYDINGS. That does not make it right.

Mr. KING. There will be injustices. I would rather face the possibility of injustice or of some other nation committing a wrong against the Filipinos after they had their independence than to have my country perpetrate a wrong by subjecting the people of the Philippines against their will to American rule, even though it be conceded that under American rule they are deriving material and other benefits more important for the moment than if they enjoyed independence. We do not measure ultimately human rights or, indeed, progress by a few years or the span of a century. We measure the progress of humanity by centuries, by cycles. For a few years or a hundred years it might be less advantageous for the Filipinos to be independent than to be under American rule; but we must look into the future and determine what, based upon the lessons of history and the experience of nations, will be the final rewards and benefits in character, culture, and those qualities which constitute the foundations of true civilization. There are moral values and spiritual and social questions that must be considered in dealing with the issues involved in the relations of governments and peoples.

The important question is, What is right, what is just? Not what does it profit us or others financially or materially. The Filipinos have aspirations which we must not ignore and rights which we must not deny. They may fall below the American people in intelligence and capacity to govern themselves, but they have aspirations and ideals; they have their own culture and their own views of life, and we have no right to impose upon them our views by force, even though our views and civilization measure up to a higher standard.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator for permitting the interruption and, while I do not go all the way with him, I am very sympathetic with most of his arguments.

Mr. KING. I am going to read a few words from the planks in three Democratic national platforms. The Senator from Maryland is a Democrat and he voted for those platforms and therefore has pledged himself to give to the Filipinos their independence.

Mr. TYDINGS. I voted for some platforms, I will say to the Senator, not with reference to the Filipinos, but some other things, with a great deal of misgiving.

Let me interrupt the Senator again, before he does that, to say that Congress itself in the Jones bill gave a promise to the Filipino people that they would eventually get independence.

Mr. KING. I have read that.

Mr. TYDINGS. That certainly would take precedence over a party platform, and if we in Congress, the authorized representatives of all the people, have promised the Filipinos their independence certainly we should either repeal the law or give them their independence and not make promises we can not or will not fulfill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I stated that I would read from Democratic platforms.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, while the Senator is looking for that plank I would like to call his attention to a report made by the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House in 1924. The majority report provided for the giving of independence to the Filipinos within 20 years and the minority report, signed by eight Members of the House of Representatives, provided for immediate independence of the Filipinos. Nothing ever came of the report upon the bills then before that committee providing for independence of the Filipinos.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the date of the report?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is report No. 709 of the House of Representaitves, Sixty-eighth Congress, third session. The report was made by Mr. Fairfield for the majority of the Committee on Insular Affairs on May 10, 1924.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I read from the Democratic platform of 1928:

> The Filipino people have succeeded in maintaining a stable government and have thus fulfilled the only condition laid down by the Congress as a prerequisite to the granting of independence. We declare that it is now our duty to keep our promise to these people by granting them immediately the independence which they so honorably covet.

I now read from the Democratic platform of 1924:

> The Filipino people have succeeded in maintaining a stable government and have thus fulfilled the only condition laid down by Congress as a prerequisite to the granting of independence. We declare that it is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to these people by granting them immediately the independence which they honorably covet.

May I say that, as a delegate to the convention, I had the honor to prepare that plank, but I copied it almost verbatim from one of the last messages to Congress delivered by President Wilson.

In 1920 we declared in our national platform:

> We favor the granting of independence without unnecessary delay to the 10,500,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

Other platform declarations appear in preceding platforms of the Democratic Party.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted some time ago I was reading from an article written by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt shortly before his death. May I conclude the reference to that article?—

> The present administration—

That is, speaking of the Wilson administration—> was elected upon the outright pledge of giving the Filipinos independence.

That is the interpretation placed by Mr. Roosevelt upon the Democratic platform and upon the declaration in the Jones bill, which I have read to the Senate.

> Apparently its course in the Philippines has proceeded upon the theory that the Filipinos are now fit to govern themselves. Whatever may be our personal and individual beliefs in this matter, we ought not, as a nation, to break faith or even to seem to break faith.

I commend these words of a great Republican to my Republican friends, especially the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] upon the other side of the Chamber.

In another article written by Mr. Roosevelt the following appears:

> I hope, therefore, that the Filipinos will be given their independence at an early date and without any guaranty from us which might in any way hamper our future action or commit us to staying on the Asiatic coast. I do not believe we should keep any foothold whatever in the Philippines. Any kind of position by us in the Philippines merely results in making them our heel of Achilles if we are attacked by a foreign power. They can be of no compensating benefit to us. If we were to retain complete control over them and to continue the course of action which in the past 16 years has resulted in such immeasurable benefit to them, then I should feel that it was our duty to stay and work for them in spite of the expense incurred by us and the risk we thereby ran.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, can the Senator tell me how much it has cost us each year to run the Philippines?

Mr. KING. No; but it is more than a billion dollars since we took possession of the islands. I recollect that Senator Hoar, at the time he delivered his remarkable address in this Chamber in behalf of the independence of the Filipinos, declared that we had expended more than half a billion dollars.

I continue the quotation from Mr. Roosevelt:

> But inasmuch as we have now promised to leave them, and as we are now abandoning our power to work efficiently for and in them, I do not feel that we are warranted in staying in the islands in an equivocal position, thereby incurring great risk to ourselves without conferring any real compensating advantage, of a kind which we are bound to take into account, on the Filipinos themselves. If the Filipinos are entitled to independence, then we are entitled to be freed from all the responsibility and risk which our presence in the islands entails upon us.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROOKHART in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to get the Senator's idea about our real duty to the Filipinos. It comes about, because of the recent agitation which, I presume, has reached the ears of the Senator from Utah as well as the rest of us, concerning a new tariff bill which it is proposed to pass in the special session of the next Congress. It is claimed, and I think we will find it to be true, that there will be quite an attempt made to put a tariff on some of the products of the Philippine Islands. I would like to get the Senator's idea on this question. Regardless of the legal aspect, which is more or less technical, have we any moral right, holding the Philippine Islands as we do, to levy a tariff on the products of those islands that come into the United States?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, while the Senator was temporarily absent from the Chamber the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] stated that he proposed to support a tax—I think he used the word "tax"—in the approaching tariff bill. Of course, the tariff is a tax imposed upon the people for the purpose of raising the prices upon commodities for the benefit of the American producer. The tariff is a tax upon consumption.

The Senator from Louisiana declared his purpose to support a tax upon Philippine sugar brought into the United States in order that the price of the domestic product as well as that imported might be increased to the American consumer. I have realized, Mr. President, that the tariff bill which will soon be before us will present in an acute form the Philippine question. There are those who will insist that we should tax Philippine products and commodities brought to the United States; that we should subject the same to our tariff laws, though we force upon them free trade and insist that our commodities taken to the Philippine Islands shall there be admitted free of duty. There are Americans who contend that this policy is immoral and violative of the letter and spirit of the Constitution. They are unwilling to hold alien people for exploitation, denying to them the rights of American citizens. I have believed that in view of this purpose to violate what many conceive to be moral and constitutional principles we should free the Philippines and bid them go their way as an independent nation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no desire either to engage in or to lead the Senator into a discussion of the tariff. The question I shall ask is, in my judgment, away beyond any consideration as to the kind of a tariff we are to have.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator if I understand him, that there is a question of morality involved.

Mr. NORRIS. We shall honestly disagree as to what the tariff should be and as to the policy that ought to be pursued by our Government; but I am asking the Senator the question whether, as a matter of honor and good morals, we have the right to hold a people in subjection—for it is, more or less, subjection in which we are holding them, even conceding that we are doing right in holding them; I am not raising that issue—and when we do so hold a people, especially a people different from our own, have we in honor a right to levy a tax on any of their products? I know that the effort will be made to put a tariff on sugar—perhaps such a tax ought to be levied; I am not saying that it should not be—but if a tax can rightfully be levied on sugar, of course, it follows that we can levy a tax on any or all of the commodities those people produce.

Mr. KING. Unquestionably.

Mr. NORRIS. In what position shall we be in before the civilized world if we hold a people against their will under subjection, and then levy a tax on everything they produce that comes into this country? For the purpose of this question I do not care anything about the tariff on any particular article; I am talking only about the principle, whether we have a right to do that?

Mr. KING. I have indicated that I would regard the policy suggested by the Senator as against good morals, and may be subject to challenge upon constitutional grounds. I can not bring my conscience to accept the view that we should conquer an alien race situate in remote lands; that we should regard them as outside the protection of the Constitution and unworthy of the rights of American citizens; that we should adopt colonial policies and those programs which have been followed by autocratic and imperialistic powers; that we should say to the Filipinos, "You have no right to be free; you are a subject race and can only have those rights and privileges which we, in a spirit of graciousness or mercy, shall feel disposed to grant you; we may cut off your trade with our own country and with other countries; we may exploit you and treat you as appendages to our commercial and business interests, or as fit subjects to aid our capitalists and adventurers who may seek profit beyond the borders of their own country; we may force free trade upon you and may deny entrance into the United States of your commodities and products and subject them to high tariff duties and thus prevent your prosperity and prohibit your material and commercial progress." Mr. President, this view to me is dangerous to republican institutions and to democratic ideals, and may not be defended upon the principles of honor and morality which should guide the conduct of a Christian nation.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator give us any information as to what history discloses that other governments have done in this respect in the case of peoples they have held in the way we are holding the Filipinos?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the pages of history reveal the tragic fate of conquered nations subjected to discriminatory legislation and unjust laws. They further reveal that conquering and oppressive nations have been compelled to expiate their crimes and injustices. The sands of the deserts cover once powerful nations, destroyed by their own sins and transgressions, their injustices to feeble states and backward peoples. No nation can oppress a people and escape the punishment that will be inflicted by a just God. Wrongs committed by nations are as certain to be punished as are wrongs committed by individuals. The life of a nation may be long, but its transgressions will be discovered; its injustices punished.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from Utah will recall that one of the chief causes of complaint against England by the American colonists was that she had a monopoly on the business of the Colonies and prevented them from trading with other nations of the world. One of the protests in the Declaration of Independence, one of the charges against England, was the cutting off of our trade with all parts of the world. They required us to trade with them and required us to send our goods directly to England. That was one of the underlying causes and one of the chief elements of tyranny which brought about the uprising in America.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator for his interruption. May I say to him that there is a powerful movement to extend our coastwise laws to the Philippine Islands. If this policy prevails the Filipinos can not ship their products or import commodities from other countries except in American ships.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If we claim the right to extend our coastwise shipping laws to the Philippine Islands, assuming that right to exist, it seems to me it follows as night must follow the day that we have no right to levy a tariff on their products that come into this country. We have not any moral right, so far as I can see, to say, "You shall ship your products in American vessels, but when those products come to our shores we will levy a tax on them."

I should like to call attention to the fact that, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the slogan in revolutionary days was "no taxation without representation." Are we not, if we undertake to levy that kind of a tax, taxing them without giving them a voice, without giving them representation; in fact, are we not doing the same thing that we denounced the mother country for doing in the prerevolutionary days and which was one of the reasons why the Revolutionary War was fought?

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, the Senator has stated the situation accurately; and yet that is the course we propose to pursue with respect to the Filipinos.

The Senator will recall that Carmi Thompson was sent to the Philippines by Mr. Coolidge to make a survey. I have never seen his report, if he made one—and doubtless he did—but many feared, and I expressed that fear in the Senate when he was appointed, that he had gone there for the purpose of surveying the opportunities for American capital. Almost contemporaneous with his visit a manufacturer in the United States proposed to invest one or two hundred million dollars in the islands for the purpose of developing rubber, and other American capitalists are seeking opportunities to make large investments in various enterprises in the Philippines. That I deplore, because, Mr. President, the results are found ultimately to be disappointing; just the same as in Haiti the Haitian people appreciated the dangers which would menace them if foreign capital came into Haiti and aliens should acquire land. Haiti is only a small island of about 10,000 square miles; and, having more than 2,000,000 people, they have to depend upon agriculture. They appreciated that if large holdings were acquired by foreigners they would become a nation of peons, whereas before the Americans went there in 1915, conquered Haiti, and subjugated it by bayonet rule to the control of the United States, 95 per cent of the Haitian people owned plots of ground upon which most of them worked out their livelihood. When we took their Government away from them we abolished their constitution; we wrote another constitution, and in the new constitution we superimposed upon them at the point of the bayonet a provision that foreigners, and corporations, too, for that matter, might acquire territory; and thousands of acres of the very best lands in Haiti have been acquired by American capitalists and the Haitians ousted, and they are now working as tenants, as peons for American capitalists. The result will be, of course—and it can not be otherwise—the deterioration of the manhood of the Haitians, the loss of courage and independence, and more and more they will sink into the position of peons and economic slaves.

Americans have complained about the situation in Mexico because large property owners held millions of acres of land and reduced more than 80 per cent of the population to a condition of peonage. If we are to hold the Philippines for exploitation, if American capital is free to enter, then little by little the lands and resources of the archipelago will be drawn into the maelstrom of American capitalism. This will produce serious consequences—weakening the people, debilitating their courage, and diminishing their capacity for self-government.

The policy is wrong. Give them their independence and let them fight their way upon the great international seas. They are willing to take the risk; and people who are willing to take the risk of winning and maintaining their independence should have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. President, I have here an article written by a Filipino. I may not agree with all his statements, but I ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate. It points out some of the difficulties that are to be encountered, some of the dangers before us, and some of the questions involved in the proposed tariff legislation that will be brought before us in the coming Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reading the article? The Chair hears none. The article will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Nation of January 23, 1929]

JUSTICE TO FILIPINOS

By Vincente G. Bunuan

The greatest single problem that confronts the United States to-day with reference to the Philippine question is the conflict that has arisen in the economic interests of the Philippines and the United States. For America is beginning to realize that the Philippines constitute a source of danger to her own economic well-being. And this clash will assume increasing proportions if the present political relations between the two countries remain unchanged. Already steps have been taken by the particular concerns affected to protect themselves from Philippine incursions into American life and interests.

The free-trade relationship between the United States and the Philippines should first be considered. American beet sugar is menaced by Philippine sugar, and so in behalf of that industry the Timberlake bill, which would limit the exportation of Philippine sugar to this country to 500,000 long tons, was introduced in the last session of Congress. Were this bill enacted into law it would place the Philippines at a further disadvantage in the free-trade relations between the two countries, because under the present free-trade arrangement Philippine products exported to the United States containing 20 per cent of foreign material can not be admitted here free of duty, while all American products containing any amount of foreign material are admitted free of duty in the Philippines.

Philippine copra is proving itself a menace to the dairy industry of the United States and quite naturally efforts are being made to counteract the danger by the proposal to limit the importation of this product or by the imposition of duty upon it.

Competition with Philippine lumber has caused a great deal of worry to American concerns engaged in the lumber industry. They have succeeded in securing a prohibition of the use of the trade name "Philippine mahogany" on certain species of Philippine lumber which has borne that name during the last two decades.

It will be noted that free trade between the Philippines and the United States has the effect of placing our goods in competition with American products. The Filipinos do not blame American concerns for seeking relief, but it does not seem quite just and fair that there should be a duty or limitation on our products and none on American goods. America, the sovereign power, on the one hand, can not assume the unrestricted privileges of free trade and, on the other hand, impose on the Philippines, the subject colony, the disadvantage of limitation. Reciprocity to be real must be mutual. Aside from the effects of free trade there are other manifestations of the conflict of interests between the Philippines and the United States. The presence on the Pacific coast of a large number of Filipinos is proving itself a menace to American labor. With a view to protecting the interests of the latter in this connection, a bill was introduced by Representative WELCH, of California, at the last session of Congress barring Filipinos from the United States.

Also, out on the Pacific coast the right of a Filipino to own land has been questioned. It is a significant coincidence that this became the object of public discussion at the very time Governor General Stimson was urging the Philippine government to liberalize land laws for American capital. Again, at the last session of Congress an amendment that had already been incorporated in the new merchant marine bill and which had already passed the House which would have permitted the Filipinos the same privileges of employment, as to number and rank, in American vessels that American citizens, including Hawaiians and Porto Ricans, possess, was stricken out at the last minute by the conference committee of both Houses. Under the present arrangement Filipinos are treated in this connection just like foreigners. The unfairness of this situation becomes even more apparent when one considers the fact that Americans may be employed without restriction of any kind in vessels of Philippine registry.

Then, too, Filipino officers in the United States Army can only be assigned to the Philippine Scouts. As the highest rank in that branch of the United States Army is as yet only that of colonel, they can not rise beyond that rank, at least for the present. Incidentally it may be stated that during the Spanish régime Filipinos could rise to the highest military rank, and command, as they did, Spanish troops. Filipinos have occupied the post of Prime Minister of Spain.

The question of the naturalization of a Filipino is another instance of conflict. Previous to 1925 Filipinos were held eligible to become citizens of the United States. Many Filipinos took advantage of this ruling in many States of the Union and are now American citizens. In 1925, however, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled, in a decision rendered in the case of Toyoto against the United States (268 U. S. 402, May 25, 1925), that Filipinos, except those who have served in the Navy three years, are not qualified for American citizenship. Although Toyoto was a Japanese, the decision also ruled specifically on Filipino eligibility.

It will be seen from the foregoing that Filipino interests constitute a menace to this country and measures have been taken, with others sure to follow, to counteract this danger. In so far as the Filipinos are concerned, their contention is—and all fair-minded people will agree with them—that it is only just and fair that while we are under the American flag, and that against our will, we are entitled to all the rights and privileges which that flag affords to all that come under it. We are willing to have America impose duty and limitation upon our goods in the selfsame manner that it is imposed upon the goods of other foreign nations. But to do that she must first set us free. We are ready to have her apply to the Filipinos the restrictions of her immigration law as they are now applied to foreign peoples. But she must first give us our liberty.

She may continue treating us as foreigners with respect to limitation of employment in her merchant marine. But we should first be as free as the foreign peoples upon whom this limitation is now applied. She may impose any restriction or forbid us altogether from owning land in the United States, but she must place us on a plane of political equality with her. She may continue to set a limit to the rank to which we may attain in her Army and in her Navy, or prevent us from joining them entirely, but first we should be made free.

She may prevent us from becoming citizens of this great country, but first she must sever the political bonds that now bind the two peoples together.

The granting of independence to the Philippines, as pledged not only in the Philippine organic act but also by authorized spokesmen of the American people, is the best way out of the tangle in which the Philippine problem has become enmeshed—the best for us because it satisfies our natural and legitimate longing to live an entirely free and independent national life; the best for the American people because it provides a way out of the danger to her own interests, economic and otherwise, without discriminating against us. If this is done, then the United States would be fully justified in safeguarding her own interests in the manner the concerns affected propose. We are either under the American flag or we are not under the American flag. Despite all the advantages and the blessings which we have derived from our very fruitful association with America, for which we are eternally grateful, we prefer separation, for only in that way can we preserve our national identity, no matter how humble that may be.

A new era has dawned in the Philippines, an era fraught with problems that challenge the highest type of statesmanship; the new governor general on the one side and the Filipino leaders on the other are making an earnest endeavor to approach these problems with sympathetic understanding. And in the atmosphere of mutual friendship which now happily obtains in the islands, the Philippine problem should come to an early solution.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

During the delivery of Mr. KING's speech, Mr. BINGHAM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference have not agreed on amendment numbered 36.

HIRAM BINGHAM,
L. C. PHIPPS,
CARTER GLASS,
JOHN B. KENDRICK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBT. G. SIMMONS,
WM. P. HOLADAY,
ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator make some statement about the conference report?

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] should be notified so that he may be present when the conference report is considered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that there is nothing in the conference report regarding the street railway merger, if that is the matter he has in mind.

Mr. BLEASE. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is there anything of a controversial nature in it?

Mr. BINGHAM. The matter of a controversial nature was with regard to the fiscal relations, as to which the Senate had to recede as the House was unwilling to grant any part of the increase.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was that the principal difference?

Mr. BINGHAM. That was the principal controversial matter. Another was with regard to a sanatorium for tubercular children or children afflicted with pulmonary tuberculosis, for which the Senate had appropriated $150,000. The House conferees believed the plans were not sufficiently advanced to enable us to know just what it would cost, and the Senate conferees receded so far as to agree to provide $1,500 to be immediately available for a study of the situation and of the needs for a sanatorium for tubercular children, and accepted the House request that we recede from the $150,000. There was only one other controversial matter, to which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will undoubtedly refer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Tennessee, as a member of the committee on conference and as a member of the District of Columbia Committee, that I am familiar with the report and I am quite satisfied with it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Utah is satisfied I believe we should agree to the conference report.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think it is generally considered to be a pretty good bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. There was nothing about the street-car companies in it at all?

Mr. BINGHAM. The only reference to the street-car companies was with regard to the repairs of the bridge over to Anacostia.

Mr. McKELLAR. I recall that provision.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senate believed that the street-car company should pay for that part of the repairs which came between the rails and 2 feet at each side of the rails and that the District should pay for the rest of the repairs; but the House did not agree to that and insisted that the street-car company should pay one-half of the cost for the rest of the bridge repairs, and, in view of certain representations made to the Senate conferees, they receded.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senate conferees receded on that matter?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes. That was the only reference to the street-car companies.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from Tennessee that I think this is a very fair bill? Of course, it does not represent the views of all of us. There are some things I should like to see in the bill which are not there, and perhaps a few things are there that I would have preferred to have deleted, but, taking the bill all in all, I think it is a wise piece of legislation, and I commend the able Senator from Connecticut for the splendid service he has rendered in the formulation of the measure.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I agree absolutely with all the Senator from Utah has just said. I did not sign the conference report because there is one provision in it, inserted by the House, which contains a principle that I feel that I could not approve. That deals with the matter of the employment of school-teachers in the District. I am not going to discuss the matter at any length at all. The conferees have made a provision very much more in accord with my view by extending the time when the limit on the employment of teachers coming into the District from the outside shall be raised. They have put it up to 1933 instead of 1931, and that goes a long ways toward meeting my views in regard to the matter. The limit of 25 per cent practically in the employment of teachers in the District or, rather, providing for the employment of teachers from outside the District when 25 per cent of the required number has been filled by teachers from within the District is not in accordance with my view. I do not think it ought to be done.

That is all I am going to say. I am heartily in favor of every other proposition in the bill. As the Senator from Utah has said, it is really an exceptionally good bill. I am not going to discuss the principle, but conscientiously I felt that I could not affix my signature to the report. I do not want to do anything to delay the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what the Senator from Washington has stated arouses my curiosity to know just what that contention is which pertains to the public schools.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I tell the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I want to hear about it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the Senator that the present law requires the Board of Education to fill vacancies among the teachers in the elementary schools entirely from graduates of the normal schools in so far as there are graduates of the normal schools applying for those positions.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean the normal schools of the District of Columbia?

Mr. BINGHAM. I refer to the normal schools of the District of Columbia. As a matter of fact, the graduates of the colored normal school are so numerous that less than 10 per cent of them can find employment in the District because there are so few vacancies. Of the graduates of the white normal school about 50 per cent find employment because of vacancies. The percentage varies from year to year. Some years 60 per cent and other years 40 per cent may find such employment. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] pointed out that it was to the interest of the children of the District that the Board of Education be able to secure the very best teachers obtainable in the United States.

Mr. JONES. I think I ought to say right there, that I am heartily in favor of giving the people in the District the best education facilities possible. I refrained from entering into that question because I did not care to arouse any extended discussion of it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not mean to get into any disputatious subject. I was trying to explain to the Senator from Nebraska just what the point was.

Mr. JONES. The Senator spoke of what was really a matter of contention.

Mr. BINGHAM. I avoid the contentious point, and say to the Senator from Nebraska that what the committee has done is as follows: The suggestion of the chairman of the Board of Education to the committee was that if the committee would provide for the people of the District a teachers' college with a 4-year course, leading to a degree, as many States provide for their citizens, he would have no objection then to doing away with the existing law requiring the Board of Education to employ the graduates of the normal schools. The committee did provide that there shall be a teachers' college and a 4-year course and a degree, and at the end of 1933 the vacant positions in the elementary schools will be filled by competition, in which everyone will have a chance to compete.

Mr. NORRIS. All over the United States?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the universal practice is, so far as I know, in all the States that the board of education or the authority having the power to select teachers may have the entire world from which to make selections.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that is very wise. I should not like to circumscribe such selections by geographical boundaries. The people of the District of Columbia ought to have just as good schools as can be found anywhere in the entire world, and there should be the same latitude in the selection of teachers. It occurred to me that possibly one reason for providing that the teachers of elementary schools should be selected from the District and the board not be allowed to go outside the District was because in Washington, perhaps more than in any other city in the United States, there is danger of political influence being brought to bear upon the appointing power, there being so many public officials in the District, and teachers might be appointed because of political reasons rather than giving a 100 per cent consideration to their qualifications.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I inquired of the superintendent of education the other day with regard to how appointments were made on competitive examination, whether they took an applicant at the top of the list or exercised some judgment in the matter, and he said they took the one at the top of the list; so that political considerations do not enter into the selections.

Mr. NORRIS. Are the teachers selected from a certified list?

Mr. BINGHAM. Teachers for the high schools and for the junior high schools are now selected by open competition.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be a serious objection, as everyone will concede, if in any possible way the teachers for the District should be selected on account of political influence.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I have in mind an incident that was cited to me as an actual occurrence where such political influence was used, and if I have been told the truth about it, it was, in my judgment, absolutely without justification. An assistant superintendent of one of the schools was selected, not because of his qualifications but because of political influence that was brought to bear upon the appointing power. I suppose there is more danger of that in a city like Washington than, perhaps, in any other city of the United States; and if there would be one thing that would justify confining the selection of teachers to graduates from the normal schools of the District it would be that. I can not conceive of any other.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to say that all teachers in the high schools and in the junior high schools are selected by competition from the top of the list?

Mr. BINGHAM. My understanding is that they are selected by open competition to-day, and that the law merely applies to teachers in the elementary schools.

Mr. NORRIS. And that they are selected in order from the top of the list?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; in open competition.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, permit me to say just one more word. One of the greatest objections I had was, it seemed to me, that such a provision ought not to have been incorporated in an appropriation bill, but ought to have been dealt with by a legislative committee, where the matter could have been gone into much more carefully than it has been.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the Senate that amendment No. 36 is the amendment providing for the 4-year-course teachers' college, which, since it is new legislation, must go before the House and be voted on, especially before it can be agreed to by the conferees. The conferees on the part of the House, however, assured us that it would meet the approval of the House.

Mr. JONES. As a matter of fact, the conferees on the part of the House agreed to it, but they had to take it back to the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator from Utah for yielding.

PRESERVATION OF THE NIAGARA FALLS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 333) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized and directed during the sessions, recesses, or adjourned periods of the Seventy-first Congress to investigate the subject of the convention and protocol between the United States and His Majesty the King of Great Britain for the preservation and improvement of the scenic beauty of the Niagara Falls and rapids, concluded at Ottawa on January 2, 1929.

For the purposes of this resolution such committee or subcommittees is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such stenographic and other assistance, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of such stenographic service to report such hearings and testimony shall not be in excess of 25 cents per 100 words. The expenses of such committee or subcommittee, which shall not exceed $2,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers properly approved.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is it the purpose to investigate how much more water can be taken out for power purposes by the two Governments and how much more water can be used by the power companies and still not destroy the scenic beauty of the Falls?

Mr. BORAH. We are going to investigate the entire subject. We have a treaty which we have negotiated with Canada, and there are some people who desire to be heard in opposition to it. This is simply to give them an opportunity to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17053) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator who objected to dispensing with the formal reading of the appropriation bill if he cares for further formal reading, and if we may not now consider the bill for committee amendments?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can not understand what the Senator says.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator from Utah waive his request for the formal reading of the bill?

Mr. KING. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the formal reading of the bill is dispensed with. The Secretary will read the bill for action on the committee amendments.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate briefly a matter which concerns the Senate itself. The Washington Post of to-day contains three distinct insults to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will wait.

Mr. HEFLIN. It will take only two or three minutes to read the statements and say what I feel should be said.

George Rothwell Brown, who writes the column entitled "Postscripts," for the Washington Post, has insulted this body a number of times recently. He seems to be offended because on yesterday the representatives of the American people in the Senate of the United States registered their will here on the prohibition question in a manner opposed to Brown's wishes. You know, a "postscript" is always found at the bottom of a letter and below everything else, and that is where this "postscript" writer belongs—at the bottom of the list of all the newspaper writers—good, bad, and indifferent.

Listen to what he says of the action of this body on yesterday when Senators representing the sovereign States of this Union cast their votes in favor of a bill to punish violations of the Constitution and laws of this country:

The once great United States Senate, now a little stuffed fox terrier, listens to "its master's voice."

How long will real red-blooded Senators permit such a man as that to occupy a seat in the Senate press gallery? The time has come when we will have to lay down some rules regarding such insults to and such cowardly and brazen misrepresentation of the Senate of the United States. One of them sat there the other day—one of these agents of Romanism, an individual by the name of little Ray Tucker—and deliberately lied about me and what occurred on the Senate floor, misrepresenting me from start to finish as to what occurred here during the flag amendment debate. So now this man, George Rothwell Brown, boldly and vulgarly insults this body.

Listen, Senators, to this. He says:

The new reign of terror begins as the adoption by the Senate of an amendment to the prohibition law making the penalty for selling a pint of gin as severe as that for manslaughter or burglary reveals the fact that, deplore it as one may, the real Government of the United States of America to-day is not Congress and the Executive but the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. President, he asserts that the greatest government in all the world has passed out of existence, that the Anti-Saloon League is the Government, and that we have no Congress and no President. It is an insult to President Coolidge; it is an insult to Congress; it is an insult to the people whose Government this is to permit such a miserable specimen of humanity to occupy a seat in the Senate press gallery and insult this body and all the high officials of our Government. I am getting tired of these agents of the whisky interests and other crooked interests——

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Sitting around here and firing from their hiding places in the dark into the backs of United States Senators.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I make the point that it is disorderly for a Member of this body to speak in such scurrilous terms of the representatives of the press, who are in no position effectively to retaliate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland defends this sort of slur and slander against the Senate.

Mr. BRUCE. I know nothing about Mr. George Rothwell Brown——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am reading from his article.

Mr. BRUCE. He is one of the wittiest and most charming paragraphers in this country. Unlike the Senator from Alabama, he is the mortal foe of dullness. So far as his observations on the Senate——

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I make the point that it is disorderly conduct——

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator can not make a point against me for what I may say about some outside person's act against some Senator or the Senate itself.

Mr. BRUCE. I make the point that it is disorderly conduct for the Senator to insult the Members of the Senate——

Mr. HEFLIN. I repudiate the Senator's statement——

Mr. BRUCE. I make the point——

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator does not have to yield. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. BRUCE. I say that it is disorderly conduct on the part of the Senator, and that it tends to bring the Senate into public discredit and disgrace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Senator from Alabama will proceed in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. The people of Maryland have certainly done a great service to this body——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state——

Mr. HEFLIN. And to the American people——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will suspend just a moment. The Chair will state to the Senator from Maryland that if there is any word used by the Senator from Alabama which is disorderly, the procedure will be to order it taken down, and then to ascertain whether it is a matter of disorder. The Chair did not rule that what the Senator said was in disorder, but that he should proceed in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not yield to the Senator from Maryland for anything. A Senator who wants to protest against a Senator when he rises to defend this body, its honor, its integrity, its dignity, its self-respect, and who defends a newspaper man who insults the Senate can not interrupt me with my permission now. That is not all that this newspaper man does. He refers to the Senate down here in the most scandalous and scurrilous terms. He says, "The Senate and the Chicago gangsters continue to set the country an example of lawlessness."

When are we going to put a stop to such insults from these rum and bootleg agents who infest this Capitol——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Who slander the good men and women of the country who stand here and fight for clean living and good morals, and who fight for a sober and healthy generation of boys and girls? When will the time come when we can perform our duty without having some handy man up in the press gallery insult this body in a Washington newspaper flaunting in the faces of Senators every morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. From what paper was the Senator reading?

Mr. HEFLIN. The Washington Post.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator tell the Senate who is the owner of the Washington Post?

Mr. HEFLIN. Why, certainly; Ned McLean.

Mr. NORRIS. Is he the same man who undertook to deceive the Senate by writing a false letter to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. HEFLIN. He is.

Mr. NORRIS. When they were investigating Teapot Dome?

Mr. HEFLIN. He is; and this man Brown is one of his hirelings. He is the man who writes this insulting and untruthful stuff about the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I submit that the Anti-Saloon League people, the good men and women who know of the evil, the suffering, and the sorrow and the curse of the open saloon, who are banded together to keep the saloon out—they helped to drive it out—and they have a right to keep on fighting against those who are seeking to return the saloon. The agents of the opposition here, paid highly by somebody, move around this Capitol and insult Senators who fight against the return of that wicked and abominable system. And when we are insulted the Senator from Maryland gets up and asks to have a Senator rebuked for resenting the insult offered to the Senate itself.

I do not know what is getting into the Senator from Maryland. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator will remember that before that paragraph of George Rothwell Brown appeared he addressed a most opprobrious insult not only to a member of the press gallery but also to two Catholic priests who happened to be sitting in one of the galleries.

Mr. HEFLIN. Who did?

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Alabama did.

Mr. HEFLIN. When?

Mr. BRUCE. A day or so ago.

Mr. HEFLIN. What did I say about them?

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator spoke of the priests in the gallery in the most contemptuous terms, and then addressed to a member of the press gallery language that I will not offend the decency of the Senate by repeating.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, can we not proceed to transact business now?

Mr. BRUCE. My remarks are not, of course, prompted by any feeling about prohibition. I know the Senator has sufficient opinion of me to acquit me of any such idea as that. I think it is due to parliamentary decency that the members of the press should not be insulted when they are in no position to retaliate, and the servants of God, priests or ministers or pastors who happen to be in our galleries, should not be so insulted.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I had about finished and I will take but a few more moments, I assure the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator to be as brief as he can.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] is always quick to come to the rescue when you name a Roman Catholic priest, but the Senator himself attacks Bishop Cannon and Doctor Straton and Billy Sunday; and others who believe as he does do the same. They hold these three great Protestant leaders up to ridicule, but if you say anything about their pets, the Roman priests, then you are trespassing upon the Pope's preserves, and doing something radically wrong.

Mr. President, I did refer to the presence in the gallery of Roman priests who were there the other day smiling their approval when the flag amendment was defeated. Was there anything wrong in saying they smiled on that occasion? I for one am getting very weary of Senators who are for protecting "one particular" class of ministers in this country and who are attacking, repudiating, and slandering those of Protestant denominations.

I think one of the greatest men in this country is Bishop Cannon, of Virginia. He is a man of superb intellect and great learning, a man of broad vision, and a man of fine moral courage and Christian character.

Doctor Straton, of New York, an able and eloquent Baptist preacher, a man of fine parts and high ideals. He is one of the foremost and best-beloved leaders of Protestantism and Christianity in America.

Billy Sunday, the greatest evangelist since the days of Sam Jones, is a terror to liquor dealers and bootleggers and to all manner of sin and crime against our country. He is still going about doing good to those who love and serve our country. And yet, Senators, you have heard these great Americans attacked and denounced right here in the Senate. But if you dare refer to a Roman priest who is smiling his approval from the gallery, then you have done something terrible.

Now, Mr. President, since the Senator has seen fit to refer to my reference to the priests in the gallery on the day the Senate voted down my flag amendment, I am going to tell of an incident that occurred here last Monday. A Protestant preacher, I think he is a Baptist, sent his card in to me from the reception room. I went out to see him, and he was very indignant. It was the day Senator BORAH and Senator REED made their speeches on the prohibition question. This man had gone up to the gallery of the Senate. He had a card from a Senator and was standing there with others in a little group waiting for the doorkeeper to get them in. A Roman Catholic Senator took three Catholic priests up to the door ahead of the group in which the Protestant preacher stood and spoke to the doorkeeper, and the doorkeeper said, "Very well," and he put them in ahead of that group already there waiting to be assigned to seats. This Protestant preacher stepped up, thinking they were showing some special preference to ministers of the gospel, showed the doorkeeper his card, and said, "I am a minister of the gospel."

The doorkeeper said, "There is nothing doing." The preacher was very indignant. He came down and sent in for me and told me about his experience. I said, "You come with me," and I took him up to the Senate Members' gallery and escorted him to a seat up there, and he heard the debate even after a certain doorkeeper in the gallery had told him, "There is nothing doing." Let the Senator from Maryland remember that as he goes along.

Mr. President, I want to treat everybody right and be fair to all. I am not trying to keep newspaper men from writing articles about what happens here. I want them to express themselves freely and decently. I believe in a free press, and I believe in constructive criticism; but I do not believe in allowing one of these little, insolent, squirrel-headed fellows to sit up there and insult this body——

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Without having rules under which he can be punished and denied a seat in the Senate press gallery.

Mr. BRUCE. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Such a one should be barred from the press gallery.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask that the words of the Senator be taken down.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I will repeat them for the Senator. I said that we ought not to permit one of these little insolent squirrel heads to insult this body. The Senator objects to the "squirrel head." [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland ask that the words of the Senator from Alabama be taken down?

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator from Alabama wants to be truly insulting, let him compare their heads with his own.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not yield to the Senator from Maryland. I am utterly astounded at the Senator. I am really sorry that he has taken the stand he has here to-day. His attitude is indeed strange and deplorable. He is seeking to prevent me from properly characterizing and castigating an occupant of the press gallery who has deliberately insulted the Senate of the United States. There are those in the Senate press gallery who know how to express themselves without insulting the Senate. I am going to formulate some rules and submit them, that when a newspaper man in that press gallery deliberately falsifies the record as to what occurs here, or uses language about a Senator or the Senate, which, in the judgment of a certain committee of this body, is an insult, he shall apologize, and then the committee shall determine whether or not his privilege to sit in that gallery shall be revoked. I am tired, I repeat, of these conscienceless whisky agents coming here and using our press gallery to insult Senators who are fighting their devilish program to bring the barrooms back.

I want to tell these Senators who sympathize with that side that millions of men and women in the Nation rejoice to-day when they read that the Senate had passed another bill looking to continued war on the bootleggers; and I want to tell them that while some men to whom they have referred are demanding whisky and more whisky, their wives and children are praying to God that the stuff may be kept out of their way, and that the money being spent in that harmful and unlawful way may be used to support their families and educate their children.

The Anti-Saloon League is a great organization. It has a great many Christian men and women in it. It is fighting for good morals. It fought to put out and is now fighting to keep out the greatest evil that ever cursed this country; and now its home-loving, patriotic members and officers are being denounced as a bunch of scoundrels who seek to control and ruin the Government, and it is said that we who put the happiness of the home and the welfare of our country above the interest of the bootleggers are doing nothing but obeying the Anti-Saloon League. I had rather go along with the Anti-Saloon League than to follow this blind-tiger brigade of rum runners who have their lobbyists here and who are resorting to all kinds of miserable tactics to bring the barrooms back. They are spending money corruptly, and some of it amongst the newspapers to hurl insults into this body. We owe it to ourselves and those who sent us here to take the steps necessary to protect this Senate and its honor from insults and slander.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17053) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 18, line 14, before the words "the words," to strike out "Whenever" and insert "Wherever," so as to read:

> Wherever the words "during the session" occur in the foregoing paragraphs they shall be construed to mean the 212 days from December 1, 1929, to June 30, 1930, both inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Architect of the Capitol," at the top of page 23, to insert:

Ventilation of the Senate Chamber: The unexpended balance of the appropriation "Senate and House ventilation, 1928 and 1929," is continued and made available during the fiscal year 1930, and in addition thereto the sum of $3,725, to be available for the same purposes and under the same conditions of expenditure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire what disposition has ever been made of the plan to tear down and rebuild the Senate Chamber?

Mr. WARREN. There is nothing in the bill now before us relating to the reconstruction of the Senate Chamber. The amendment now before us merely reappropriates the money heretofore appropriated.

Mr. KING. Why should we reappropriate it?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I think the chairman of the committee misunderstood the inquiry of the Senator from Utah. The item now before the Senate is for ventilation of the Chamber and is something that has to be done whether the Chamber is reconstructed or not. The item merely provides an appropriation for ventilation of the Senate Chamber. The other resolution, I will say to the Senator from Utah, is held wholly in abeyance, and by a vote of the Committee on Rules the further consideration of it was postponed until a later and wholly indeterminate date, which will probably be some time after the 22d of April.

Mr. KING. Is there any possibility of the proposed change going forward without further action of Congress?

Mr. MOSES. In spite of my name, I have not the prophetic genius and can not say.

Mr. McKELLAR. It will not go through during this session.

Mr. KING. I hope there is nothing in the pending appropriation bill that authorizes it and permits it to be carried out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 24, line 16, after the word "Rules," to strike out "$93,628" and insert "$95,628," so as to read:

Senate Office Building: For maintenance, miscellaneous items and supplies, including furniture, furnishings, and equipment, and for labor and material incident thereto, and repairs thereof; and for personal and other services for the care and operation of the Senate Office Building, under the direction and supervision of the Senate Committee on Rules, $95,628.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 16, to insert:

To enable the Architect of the Capitol to procure preliminary plans and estimates of cost for the completion of the Senate Office Building, including the erection of the wing on the First Street side of said building, the completion of the C Street side of the said building so as to conform with the development of the park area to the north, the completion of all approaches heretofore incompleted, and for landscape treatment of the court, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 24, after the numerals "$545,000," to insert a comma and "to be immediately available," so as to read:

Capitol power plant: Stoker equipment, $162,000; new turbine, $190,000; new electrical distributing equipment, $110,000; annex, $65,000; renewal, steam piping Supreme Court section, Capitol, $13,000; lowering flood lights, Capitol, $5,000; in all, $545,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Library Building and grounds," on page 26, line 16, after the word "worker," to strike out "$1,860" and insert "$1,728," and at the end of line 20 to strike out "$42,992" and insert "$42,860," so as to read:

Salaries: Chief engineer, $2,520; chief electrician, $2,520; decorator, $2,000; painter, $1,728; assistant engineer—1 at $1,860, 2 at $1,764 each; sheet-metal worker, $1,728; 2 machinists at $1,764 each; 3 assistant electricians, at $1,800 each; carpenters—one $1,800, one $1,728; plumber, $1,740; skilled laborers—2 at $1,320 each, 5 at $1,260 each; general mechanic, $1,800; 2 laborers at $1,020 each; in all, $42,860.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Library Building," on page 33, line 7, after the word "stationery," to insert "uniforms for guards," so as to read:

For mail, delivery, and telephone services, rubber boots and rubber coats for workmen, stationery, uniforms for guards, miscellaneous supplies, and all other incidental expenses in connection with the custody and maintenance of the Library Building, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I was authorized by the committee to present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 30, line 26, after the numerals "1929," to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That so much of the act approved February 10, 1927, as requires the librarian to biennially report to Congress an index and digest of State legislation is repealed, and the Librarian of Congress is directed to have such indexes and digests printed and bound for official distribution only.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I have another committee amendment authorized by the committee, which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 35, line 25, after the word "sum," to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That hereafter such printing, binding, and blank-book work authorized by law, as the Public Printer is not able or equipped to do at the Government Printing Office, may be produced elsewhere under contracts made by him with the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. That is the last amendment on behalf of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to make some comment about the last section of the bill, section 4, which provides for the appointment of a joint committee to try to equalize the salaries of employees of the Senate and the House.

Some time ago, really on behalf of my colleague [Mr. HOWELL], because the information came from an employee who was of his patronage and came to me because my colleague was ill and could not give it attention, I gave some attention to the salaries which some employees of the Senate are receiving, something to which I never gave any attention before, and I suppose most Members of the Senate have not, either. I found that this particular employee and another one with him were stationed at one of the doors of the Senate as doorkeepers, and that at that door there is more business transacted and more duties to perform on the part of the employees than at any other door without any question; yet they were getting salaries $500, $600, $700, or $800 less per annum than other employees at other doors doing much less work.

I think it is conceded that the two employees at the east door of the Senate Chamber are as courteous and as efficient and do their work as well as any of the employees of the Senate anywhere. Most of the Senators come in through that door and see them and know them. Surely, more inquiries are made at that door than any place else by visitors to the galleries. If Senators have taken the pains to listen to the conversations or watch the conduct of those employees, they have noticed that anyone making inquiry there is always treated with the utmost courtesy. I do not believe there can be any possible fault found with their conduct.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. Without making any complaint, of course, about any of the other employees, we all know that the work at the east door of the Chamber requires that they do twice as much of that kind of work at least, I should say, as any other doorkeeper, and yet they are getting less salaries than any other employee. Upon inquiry I found that other doorkeepers had had their salaries increased from time to time on appropriation bills. No one had looked into the matter except the committee, because no one was looking after these particular employees, and so their salaries remained the same.

I took up the matter with a member of the Appropriations Committee, and he called my attention to section 4 of the present bill which undertakes to appoint a committee that will equalize the salaries of employees doing similar work both in the House and the Senate.

I yield now to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that various members of the Committee on Appropriations have had a great many applications for the correction of just such discriminations as apparently the Senator has in mind. After a most careful and thorough study of the situation, the committee discussing it for quite a while—and it has been discussed before in our committee—it was concluded that section 4 provided the fairest possible way in which all these matters could be straightened out so as to do even justice to all of the employees. I believe the Senator upon reflection will find that that is the very best possible method of arranging the matter justly and fairly to all.

The Senator from Nebraska made one statement with which I am obliged to disagree. One of the employees on the door to which he referred is not courteous. He has been very discourteous on a number of occasions. I dislike very much to make the statement, but it is the absolute fact. However, notwithstanding that he is an elderly man and there may be some excuse of health or something else that can be offered for him, if he is entitled to a better salary, as long as he does the work he ought to have that salary. But the Senator paid a high tribute to him, and I just felt that that should not go unchallenged, because I know he has been very discourteous on occasions.

Mr. NORRIS. I, of course, am not in a position to contradict the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee and I accept it at 100 per cent. Since the matter was called to my attention I have necessarily thought of the situation and watched it somewhat. I was impressed with the courteous treatment that both of these men give everyone, apparently, and I do not know to which one the Senator refers——

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know his name myself.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not ask for his name, and perhaps for the purpose of the discussion it ought not to be given.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it ought not to be given, anyway.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with section 4 of the bill, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee. I am not contradicting the justness of it, but I think in carrying out section 4 we will probably reach the proper solution. The thing that seemed to me to be unfair was that while this was going on this discrepancy still exists, and the men who are doing the most work are getting the least salary. It may be that we can not remove it in any other way.

I am told by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], with whom I took up the matter some time ago, that there are a great many similar instances both on the House side and on the Senate side.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no way in the world it can be better worked out than under this plan.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee has evidently worked it out so as to be satisfactory to everyone concerned. I commend them. I am not finding fault with their plan. The only thing that seemed to me to be just in the matter, if this were the only instance of the kind that existed, would be to try to secure an amendment to the bill now before us to equalize the situation. That would have been agreeable, I think, to the Senator from Utah; but when he called my attention to the fact that there were so many other instances, I realized that it could not be done in that way. He told me how many others there were, some 17 or 18——

Mr. WARREN. More than that.

Mr. NORRIS. More than that, the Senator from Wyoming says. It seemed to me, therefore, that probably we would not be able to equalize the matter in the limited time we have to give consideration to the bill. If we had a longer time to consider the appropriation bill, if we were not now right up against the 4th of March, and if it were not necessary to pass bills almost without reading them in order to get through by the 4th of March, I think I would have undertaken to try to get some equalization of the matter while the proposed joint committee is working out the problem. It will probably be a year before they can make their report and any results can be had.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think the Senator will approve of the plan we have worked out. I shall be very glad to confer with him at the earliest possible moment in regard to the parties he has mentioned and others as well, because we want early decisive action in the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is right. When the matter was fully explained I could not point out a better way. I want to say to Senators, however, that I am not speaking for anybody in particular. The particular person who has been called to my attention is not an employee of mine or one recommended by me. He was an appointee of my colleague, and that is the reason I have gone into it; because my colleague is sick and can not do so. I have no personal complaint to make.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I merely wish to suggest that the provision in the bill authorizing the appointment of a joint committee requires a report at the next session of Congress, which will probably convene in April.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PROPOSED NICARAGUAN CANAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the hour is still early, it being only a quarter after 5 o'clock, and I should like to have the Senate remain in session for a while longer. If any Senators are opposed to the unfinished business, which is now automatically before the Senate, I wish them to take this opportunity to make any remarks they desire to make. I do not want to take the time of the Senate. I have discussed the joint resolution on several occasions. It provides, I will say in a few words, merely for the gathering of information which the Congress must have before it can formulate any policy as to the subject matter of the joint resolution. If there be any Senators who desire to speak in opposition to the passage of the joint resolution, I should very much like to hear them do so at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	McKellar	Simmons
Barkley	Fess	McMaster	Smith
Bayard	Frazier	McNary	Smoot
Bingham	George	Mayfield	Steck
Black	Gerry	Moses	Steiwer
Blaine	Gillett	Neely	Stephens
Blease	Glass	Norbeck	Swanson
Borah	Glenn	Norris	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Goff	Nye	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Gould	Oddie	Trammell
Broussard	Greene	Overman	Tydings
Bruce	Hale	Phipps	Tyson
Burton	Harris	Pine	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Pittman	Wagner
Caraway	Hastings	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Hawes	Reed, Mo.	Walsh, Mont.
Couzens	Hayden	Robinson, Ind.	Warren
Curtis	Heflin	Sackett	Waterman
Dale	Johnson	Schall	Watson
Deneen	Jones	Sheppard	Wheeler
Dill	Kendrick	Shipstead
Edge	King	Shortridge

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution having been heretofore amended, and as amended having been agreed to, the joint resolution is not open to further amendment as in Committee of the Whole except upon a reconsideration. The joint resolution will, therefore, be reported to the Senate. It will be open to amendment in the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that upon completing its business to-day the Senate shall adjourn and that after 3 o'clock to-morrow debate on the joint resolution and any amendments thereto shall be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. HAWES. I will have to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the joint resolution was made the unfinished business with the distinct understanding on the part of the Senate that it would not interfere with appropriation bills. In view of that understanding inasmuch as there is an appropriation bill waiting to be considered by the Senate, it seems to me that any understanding in connection with the pending joint resolution is abrogated. To-day it developed that the unfinished business could not be temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent. Consequently the naval appropriations bill is completely at the mercy of one man in the Senate so long as any unfinished business is pending. I wish to serve notice that I am not going to permit that condition to continue if I can prevent it. I am not willing for the naval appropriation bill to be delayed until toward the eve of adjournment. I object to the proposed agreement submitted by the Senator from New Jersey. I am willing for the clash to come right now as to whether the unfinished business shall take precedence over the naval appropriation bill, when it was understood distinctly that measures which were made unfinished business would be made so with the understanding that they would not interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, when the request was made earlier in the day that Senate Joint Resolution 117 should be temporarily laid aside in order to consider the naval appropriation bill, as the Senator from Virginia very well knows, I was entirely agreeable that such consent should be granted, but as the Senator has indicated there was objection. As there is objection to the naval bill, while a vote to displace the unfinished business might prevail in the Senate, nevertheless that would not stop the debate. It is practically assured that the joint resolution can be disposed of to-morrow, while the naval bill, of course, can not be disposed of to-morrow, and so I do not know why the Senator would object to having the debate limited to 10 minutes, which will afford practical assurance that the joint resolution will be disposed of to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. SWANSON. Then, after to-morrow afternoon there will only be eight days of the session left for various other measures. It was understood, I repeat, that all understandings in connection with the pending joint resolution as the unfinished business would be abrogated if it should interfere with appropriation bills. It has now developed that the unfinished business does interfere with the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. EDGE. I am quite in sympathy with the naval appropriation bill; but I should like to ask the Senator if he would be in any better position if he should move to take up the naval bill to-morrow and the motion should prevail and the naval bill should then be laid before the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. Whether Senators are willing to come to a vote I do not know. Whether a filibuster will develop I do not know, and by this procedure it may never be known.

Mr. GLASS. I can answer the Senator's question for him. I know there will be.

Mr. EDGE. I think it is indicated that there will be a filibuster.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know what the Senator who has charge of the joint resolution proposes to do, and the responsibility is with him; but I am not going to consent to any more unanimous-consent agreements or arrangements until the naval bill has had a chance in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I had intended to follow the course to-morrow of moving to lay aside the unfinished business and substituting for it the naval appropriation bill. If I thought the Senator from New Jersey could secure unanimous consent to vote on the joint resolution, and could thereby get action before 4 o'clock to-morrow, I would be willing under the circumstances to let him do so. Otherwise, I should like to notify the Senate that I shall move to displace.

Mr. EDGE. Of course, I can only transmit to the Senate the information which I have secured through personal conferences with Senators who have evinced interest in the joint resolution. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] have assured me at different times that they wanted to speak briefly on the measure, but had no desire to interfere with a final vote upon it.

Mr. DILL. What is the request about the limitation of debate on the resolution?

Mr. EDGE. The unanimous-consent request as made was that at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon debate be limited to 10 minutes on the bill and on any amendments thereto.

Mr. DILL. I would not agree to that, Mr. President.

Mr. EDGE. Then there is nothing to do but to go on.

Mr. SWANSON. In order to ascertain whether or not there is a disposition to filibuster against the naval bill, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. EDGE. I myself have no objection to that being done.

Mr. BLAINE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it seems to me that we are getting into the wrong mood regarding the appropriation bills. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has been very obliging thus far. He has shown every evidence of a disposition to help. There has been no reasonable cause, it seems to me, for any heat.

I think those who have at heart the best interests of the country should be able to get together and work together. I do not believe we are going to have a filibuster that is going to defeat the naval bill or that is going to defeat any other appropriation bill. We have another very large bill to follow the naval bill.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR CURTIS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 21, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Who, after having deposited their full powers, which were found to be in good and due form by the Conference, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1

The High Contracting Parties agree to submit to the procedure of conciliation established by this convention all controversies of any kind which have arisen or may arise between them for any reason and which it may not have been possible to settle through diplomatic channels.

ARTICLE 2

The Commission of Inquiry to be established pursuant to the provisions of Article IV of the Treaty signed in Santiago de Chile on May 3, 1923, shall likewise have the character of Commission of Conciliation.

ARTICLE 3

The Permanent Commissions which have been established by virtue of Article III of the Treaty of Santiago de Chile of May 3, 1923, shall be bound to exercise conciliatory functions, either on their own motion when it appears that there is a prospect of disturbance of peaceful relations, or at the request of a Party to the dispute, until the Commission referred to in the preceding article is organized.

ARTICLE 4

The conciliatory functions of the Commission described in Article 2 shall be exercised on the occasion hereinafter set forth:

(1) The Commission shall be at liberty to begin its work with an effort to conciliate the differences submitted to its examination with a view to arriving at a settlement between the Parties.

(2) Likewise the same Commission shall be at liberty to endeavor to conciliate the Parties at any time which in the opinion of the Commission may be considered to be favorable in the course of the investigation and within the period of time fixed therefor in Article V of the Treaty of Santiago de Chile of May 3, 1923.

(3) Finally, the Commission shall be bound to carry out its conciliatory function within the period of six months which is referred to in Article VII of the Treaty of Santiago de Chile of May 3, 1923.

The Parties to the controversy may, however, extend this time, if they so agree and notify the Commission in due time.

ARTICLE 5

The present convention does not preclude the High Contracting Parties, or one or more of them, from tendering their good offices or their mediation, jointly or severally, on their own motion or at the request of one or more of the Parties to the controversy; but the High Contracting Parties agree not to make use of those means of pacific settlement from the moment that the Commission described in Article 2 is organized until the final act referred to in Article 11 of this convention is signed.

ARTICLE 6

The function of the Commission, as an organ of conciliation, in all cases specified in Article 2 of this convention, is to procure the conciliation of the differences subject to its examination by endeavoring to effect a settlement between the Parties.

When the Commission finds itself to be within the case foreseen in paragraph 3 of Article 4 of this convention, it shall undertake a conscientious and impartial examination of the questions which are the subject of the controversy, shall set forth in a report the results of its proceedings, and shall propose to the Parties the bases of a settlement for the equitable solution of the controversy.

ARTICLE 7

Except when the Parties agree otherwise, the decisions and recommendations of any Commission of Conciliation shall be made by a majority vote.

ARTICLE 8

The Commission described in Article 2 of this convention shall establish its rules of procedure. In the absence of agreement to the contrary, the procedure indicated in Article IV of the Treaty of Santiago de Chile of May 3, 1923, shall be followed.

Each party shall bear its own expenses and a proportionate share of the general expenses of the Commission.

ARTICLE 9

The report and the recommendations of the Commission, insofar as it may be acting as an organ of conciliation, shall not have the character of a decision nor an arbitral award, and shall not be binding on the Parties either as regards the exposition or interpretation of the facts or as regards questions of law.

ARTICLE 10

As soon as possible after the termination of its labors the Commission shall transmit to the Parties a certified copy of the report and of the bases of settlement which it may propose.

The Commission in transmitting the report and the recommendations to the Parties shall fix a period of time, which shall not exceed six months, within which the Parties shall pass upon the bases of settlement above referred to.

ARTICLE 11

Once the period of time fixed by the Commission for the Parties to make their decisions has expired, the Commission shall set forth in a final act the decision of the Parties, and if the conciliation has been effected, the terms of the settlement.

ARTICLE 12

The obligations set forth in the second sentence of the first paragraph of Article I of the Treaty of Santiago de Chile of May 3, 1923, shall extend to the time when the final act referred to in the preceding article is signed.

ARTICLE 13

Once the procedure of conciliation is under way it shall be interrupted only by a direct settlement between the Parties or by their agreement to accept absolutely the decision ex aequo et bono of an American Chief of State or to submit the controversy to arbitration or to an international court.

ARTICLE 14

Whenever for any reason the Treaty of Santiago de Chile of May 3, 1923, does not apply, the Commission referred to in Article 2 of this convention shall be organized to the end that it may exercise the conciliatory functions stipulated in this convention; the Commission shall be organized in the same manner as that prescribed in Article IV of said treaty.

In such cases, the Commission thus organized shall be governed in its operation by the provisions, relative to conciliation, of this convention.

ARTICLE 15

The provisions of the preceding article shall also apply with regard to the Permanent Commissions constituted by the aforementioned Treaty of Santiago de Chile, to the end that said Commissions may exercise the conciliatory functions prescribed in Article 3 of this convention.

ARTICLE 16

The present convention shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in conformity with their respective constitutional procedures, provided that they have previously ratified the Treaty of Santiago, Chile, of May 3, 1923.

The original convention and the instruments of ratification shall be deposited in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Chile which shall give notice of the ratifications through diplomatic channels to the other signatory Governments and the convention shall enter into effect for the High Contracting Parties in the order that they deposit their ratifications.

This convention shall remain in force indefinitely, but it may be denounced by means of notice given one year in advance at the expiration of which it shall cease to be in force as regards the Party denouncing the same, but shall remain in force as regards the other signatories. Notice of the denunciation shall be addressed to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Chile which will transmit it for appropriate action to the other signatory Governments.

Any American State not a signatory of this convention may adhere to the same by transmitting the official instrument setting forth such adherence, to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Chile which will notify the other High Contracting Parties thereof in the manner heretofore mentioned.

In witness whereof the above mentioned Plenipotentiaries have signed this convention in English, Spanish, Portugese and French and hereunto affix their respective seals.

Done at the city of Washington, on this fifth day of January, 1929.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES

The Imperial Male Quartet sang Lead, Kindly Light.

The Chaplain, Doctor Montgomery:

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.

He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters.

He restoreth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake.

Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me.

Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies; Thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.

Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.

Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me.

In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.

And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin:

And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?

And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb.

In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.

And there shall be no more curse: but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and His servants shall serve him:

And they shall see His face; and His name shall be in their foreheads.

And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light: and they shall reign for ever and ever.

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, this is a solemn moment. Would that our lips were nigh to full speech; yet we thank Thee that hope, pensive and wondering, finds its secret joy. Again and again the silver cord is loosed, the golden bowl is broken, the pitcher at the fountain and the wheel at the cistern. Oh, how true, Merciful God, that our tombs are entangled with our tasks; yet those who journey this way may come to their crown and throne. Thou wilt not forget their works of faith and their labors of love among us. They rose to the level of pure thinking. They felt the throbs of the common heart and scorned to do the evil thing. They have bequeathed us noble examples, for with distinction, patience, and gentleness they served their day. We have shared their joys; we now pay our grateful tributes. This hour we unite our hearts with all sorrowing ones. Heaven drop its charm of richest gifts upon them. We praise Thee that there is no death. The mists that are now so thick will soon lift and drift away, for behind is the sunlight. They have entered through the hidden portals and have gained the vision in that summer land of the soul, where morning becomes noon and the curtain of night is never hung. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

Hon. CHARLES A. EATON, Representative from the State of New Jersey, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES A. EATON

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, since July, 1927, eleven of our distinguished colleagues have died in the service of their country, nine of the number within the short space of nine months in the year just passed and one only three days ago.

In this memorial service we are seeking to express our sense of personal loss; our grief over brave comrades fallen by our side in battle; our sincere sympathy for their loved ones in the family circle, whose sorrow we share.

And some of us, at least, cherish the hope that this tragic toll exacted by the Grim Reaper may awaken the American people to a new understanding of the ever-increasing burden of toil and responsibility which our complex civilization places upon their elected Representatives.

We want all the world to know that we loved these fallen comrades of ours; that we revere their memory; that we are proud and grateful to have been associated with them in service; and that, however sharply divided by the accident of party attachment, or by reasoned opinion, we were and are united always in respect for their sincerity of conviction, their unblemished personal honor, their devotion to duty, their singleness of patriotic purpose.

It would be hard to assemble a group of 11 men from widely separated sections of our great country who more exactly represent in their individual endowments and experience the multiform genius of American life at its best.

GOODING, OF IDAHO

Rising from humble beginnings, step by step, to deserve and receive the highest honors within the gift of his fellow citizens. Twice elected governor of his State. Since 1920 a distinguished Member of the Senate of the United States. His most striking characteristic a high and chivalrous courage. His passing removes from the Senate one of its strong men.

VAILE, OF COLORADO

Gifted author; formidable in debate; intensely American in ideals and point of view; called suddenly in the prime of his strong manhood from the lofty outlook of his beloved mountains to the infinite horizons of eternity.

MADDEN, OF ILLINOIS

From the beginning of his long years of service, a recognized leader in this body. Wise and witty; shrewd and penetrating of judgment; without illusions and without cynicism. Governed always by a profound sense of moral obligation in handling the heavy responsibilities of his position as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, he was a great human, richly deserving the unstinted and unanimous affection and confidence of his colleagues.

RATHBONE, OF ILLINOIS

Disciple and interpreter of the immortal Lincoln. Eloquent of speech. Ungrudging of service, he literally gave his life for the honor and privilege of representing in this House the vast and varied interests of his great State.

KING, OF ILLINOIS

For 14 years a Member of this House. Honored three times in early life by election to the general assembly of his State. An efficient attorney of his home city of Galesburg. His ability, his fine moral qualities, his genius for friendship gave him a permanent place in the affection and memory of his colleagues.

OLDFIELD, OF ARKANSAS

Sturdy and worthy son of the great, young Southwest. A man four-square. Honored and trusted by all his colleagues in his position of leadership.

RUBEY AND FAUST, OF MISSOURI

Of differing political principles and party loyalties, these two distinguished sons of Missouri had much in common. Country bred, they fearlessly followed their stars of destiny out into the wider world of affairs. They were one in their high moral standard, their love of country and home, their sense of service. To each of them their fellow citizens gave ungrudging honor, and each left to his loved ones the priceless heritage of a stainless name.

SWEET, OF NEW YORK

Descended from a family closely identified with General Washington in the Revolutionary War. Speaker of the New York Assembly for six years. A seasoned veteran in the exacting work of public service, his tragic death took from this Chamber one of its most useful and trusted Members.

BUTLER, OF PENNSYLVANIA

The elder statesman of the House. Carrying for long years heavy burdens as a member and as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; inflexible of purpose; of unaffected simplicity and sweetness of nature. He knew how to soften the asperities of political conflict by the magic touch of a delicate, whimsical humor, and to win and hold the affection of every man with whom he had to do.

FROTHINGHAM, OF MASSACHUSETTS

American gentleman of the old school. Incarnating in mind and character and long years of honorable public service, the noblest and finest traditions of his native New England.

These men were unlike in temperament, in training, in point of view, in method, in historic background. They came from far-separated sections of our common country. Yet they were amazingly alike in their possession of and by those invincible, eternal, spiritual fundamentals upon which our American civilization is builded and which, for our people at least, constitute what Herbert Hoover so aptly calls "the surer forces of human advancement."

It would be a labor of love could we spend the whole time allotted us to-day in completely reviewing the qualities of mind and heart of our fallen comrades; in evaluating their individual contributions to their time and country; in paying grateful tribute to their hallowed memories; in making full acknowledgment of our personal debt to each and all of them for the stimulus and inspiration of their lives.

But I am confident that these departed comrades of ours would rather have us at this time turn to the consideration of certain great central realities upon which their lives were builded and which the occasion clothes for us who remain in the glory of a new understanding.

First. These were men of strong religious faith.

They would therefore have us face to-day with them and in this way the stupendous fact of death as the common lot and destiny of mankind. The Scottish bard sang of his dead hero:

> Now is the stately column broke,
> The beacon fire is quenched in smoke,
> The trumpet's silver sound is still,
> The warder silent on the hill.

And this simple dirge may and must describe the fate of every man:

> The clouds that gather 'round the setting sun do take a sober coloring from an eye that hath kept watch o'er man's mortality.

What, then, would these friends of ours so lately translated from the happy companionship of our common labors to the mystery and majesty of the grave have us think? We must decide to accept as they did one of two alternatives. We can think of death for them and for ourselves as the end of all being. Or we can face the experience through which they have passed and through which we must pass fortified by an invincible faith that death is merely the gateway to an eternal existence, glorious, satisfying, unshadowed by sin and sorrow and weakness.

If we follow the faith of the men in whose honor we are met to-day, we will choose the second of these alternatives.

And we will make this choice as we believe they made it—because of the common consent of mankind illumined and crowned by the glorious liberating teachings of the Christian religion.

It were folly to deny or ignore the universal all-engulfing force of death. Everywhere in nature death is the night of which life is the day. Death is the autumn of life's spring; the harvest of life's seedtime. They belong together. Death is the supreme reconstructor; the universal leveler; the great essential in all progress.

In life all rivers run their own course through their own channels and country. In death all rivers reach the sea. In life we are divided; in death united. Life has infinite diversities of character and function and relationship. Death is the infinite harmonizer and unifier. Life gives the individual his chance. Death restores him to the mass. Men live and die, but man abides.

There is one question which since time began has stirred the hearts and disturbed the minds of men. "If a man die, shall he live again?"

Through the long centuries in every phase and step of civilization men have been irresistibly moved by a universal instinct or a deep, inexpugnable spiritual hunger to believe in the reality of a spiritual world lying far outside and above the world of material sense, to which humanity belongs and in which lie the final sanctions for human conduct.

This universal hunger for life after death has created the many religions of mankind. It has erected everywhere in all ages temples and shrines. Some shadowed by the horrors of ignorance and superstition. Some glorious with the effulgence of a noble and understanding faith. But all alike the sign and symbol of that universal human passion for life which will not and can not die.

These fallen comrades of ours believed that in the Christian faith they had found not only the final answer to the world's quest for life, but also the ultimate moral ground upon which can be created a progressive, social, and political state. They died sustained by the glorious Christian hope of life beyond the grave. They have bequeathed to their loved families and to us and to the world this heritage of an all-conquering faith. Whatever else of precious memory they have left us who remain for a time behind them they, I am sure, would commend to us the exhortation of the good American poet:

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul!
As the swift seasons roll
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast
Till thou at length art free;
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea.

Second. These comrades of ours were in the noblest sense American-minded men.

They loved their country. They were the product of its institutions, the very incarnation of its spirit. They held in sacred honor those principles of life and government and social progress which have made America the land of opportunity, the door of hope for all its people.

Like ourselves they were here as elected Representatives of all the people. By the judgment and choice of free men and women they became the official exponents of free self-government, the most difficult and desirable achievement of morally responsible beings.

They, like ourselves, were sent here to guarantee human rights, to redress wrongs, to secure equal justice, to solve the perplexing problems of economic and social progress, to make real that haunting dream of the ages—government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

They were real men representing real people. In their weakness and strength, their successes and failures, they faithfully expressed the spiritual and intellectual qualities of those who sent them here. And when, worn out by the cares and burdens of public service, they passed through the narrow gateway of death, they became one with the common lot and destiny of all mankind.

In the Epistle to the Hebrews there occurs a remarkable discussion of faith as a primal faculty of the human mind, in its exercise as a controlling factor in personal conduct, and especially as it relates itself through the common experience of the individual to the progressive history of the race.

The author recites a list of illustrious names whose greatness he attributes to the exercise of this primal spiritual faculty.

By faith these ancient heroes subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens.

The story ends with the statement of a great universal principle governing all human experience in all ages:

These all having obtained a good report through faith received not the promise, God having provided some better thing for us that they without us should not be made perfect.

The application of this amazing principle on this occasion is completely clear.

Our friends have not passed out of our lives by death. They have passed into our lives. The burden they were carrying has slipped from their shoulders to ours. And unless we assume this responsibility we have robbed the world of the full fruition of their toil.

They did not take the final fruition of their labors with them. They left it with us as a glorious addition to our equipment for highest service here. The sowers have passed from the field. The harvest of their faithful sowing remains for us to reap.

This I believe would be the message of our fallen comrades were they permitted to speak to us to-day out of the larger wisdom and vision of that eternal life into which they have so worthily entered.

HAVE FAITH AND CARRY ON

They have left us the splendid task of continuing their work. This is but a part of the heritage of all the ages.

They held sacred the American home. We are to strive to preserve and perpetuate that holy of holies in the life of all free people so that always freedom-loving, honorable, American-minded men and women shall be cradled and prepared for life under its safe protection.

We are to perpetuate and make regnant those central spiritual realities which constitute the soul of America and which alone make possible the successful practice of free self-government.

We are to keep open and unobstructed that equality of opportunity which is at once the glory and the challenge of our American civilization.

We are to have faith in God, in whose keeping and loving care men find rest here and hereafter; faith in our fellow men as worthy of trust and reverence; faith in our beloved country, whose ideals, principles, and institutions have foundationed and made possible so much of human happiness; faith in those beneficent universal energies which manifest their presence and power in the unfolding drama of human history.

This is that "better thing" which, using our departed fellow workers as His chosen instruments, God has provided through them for us. This is the flaming torch of life which they carried so nobly in the forefront of the fight and which now has been thrust into our waiting hands. This is the labor of love which they have left for us to carry forward. And the highest tribute we can pay their sainted memory is here and now to dedicate ourselves afresh to our common task, facing gladly with some measure of their faith and courage whatever of good or ill the days to come may hold until at last we all get home.

The quartet sang Still, Still with Thee.

Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT, Representative from the State of Tennessee, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS OF HON. FINIS J. GARRETT

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker—

A prince once said of a king struck down:
"Taller he seems in death";
And the word holds good, for now, as then,
It is after death that we measure men.

However, sir, we have not come to measure, but to memorialize.

They were our comrades in the exacting service of a nation; we knew them; we loved them; and we mourn them.

They were among our ablest and most distinguished Members. Each had his very vivid personality, his lively individuality, and each stood with a marked degree of eminence among us.

The Congress of the United States epitomizes and expresses as no other body possibly can the genuine spirit and the profound emotion of American life.

Not infrequently the Congress is made the subject of jibe and quip and criticism. There are times when one suspects that some few of the greater journals of the country would, if they could, destroy or materially alter this particular branch as an institution of the Government. There are to be found here and there cynical citizens and self-seeking organizations that grow impatient with the legislative bodies of the Government, but taking it by and large, it is safe to assert that it would be more difficult to work a change in this than in either of the other coordinate branches. If to-day we were suddenly called upon to frame a new Federal Government, it may be doubted whether the executive and judicial branches would be constituted in all respects as they now are, but it is extremely improbable that there would be any very great alteration in the legislative plan.

This is particularly true of the House of Representatives. Each Member of this body has a direct touch with and is responsible to and representative of many thousands of people. He is their first and most immediate expression in national affairs; and while here and there an exception may occur, yet as a rule the Representative is an exponent, as it were, of the thought of his district and a reflection of its ideals and character.

In the Congress therefore as nowhere else is to be found the mosaic which pictures the national political and civic conception and quality. The widely divergent views among Members upon some issues and questions reflect, as of course, the differences of opinion concerning the proper administration of our institutions, while the fact, overlooked by many, that the major portion of the business of Congress is virtually conducted by unanimous consent illustrates how strongly popular thought has crystallized about the basic elements in the mechanism of our system.

We seldom have now any serious contests over mere matters of procedure. Whatever complaints may be made about the rules of the House, in the end it is pretty generally realized that they are the product, not of party bias, but of public necessity; and that their construction all along has followed the lines of reason and of justice.

In these exercises of to-day we are paying respect to the memory of 11 Members of the Congress, 10 from our own body and 1 from the Senate.

We find what we naturally would expect to find, namely, that in a group this large there is a near approach to a composite of the Congress itself. They constitute at least a representative cross section of Congress and therefore of the Nation itself.

In general each section is represented in this list of our sacred dead—North and South, East and West, and the regions between. There are to be found, too, in the list conspicuous and nationally known representatives of the broader political and partisan aspects characteristic of a popular government such as ours. So that this day's exercises constitute not only an occasion of honor to individuals who wrought great things in a great age but a truly and distinctly national memorial function.

It is essentially and beautifully democratic. In this democracy of death there is illustrated with peculiar vividness the broad democracy peculiar to American life. Each individual represented a distinct type of personality. The political divergencies have been already adverted to, but this is by no means all. Various religious conceptions and beliefs are likewise represented in the list.

Then, too, we may without impropriety, I think, refer to the personal financial situations of the men. Some of them were men possessed of extensive resources; others were poor men possessed of only moderate means. But all were here working together in the common cause of a nation—working sedulously for its perpetuity and betterment.

I sometimes think that in nothing is the true American spirit so conspicuously reflected as it is in the fact that in the Congress there are no distinctions growing out of the financial condition of its Members. Members are measured here not by what they possess but by what they perform. The test is not money but mentality and character.

In this at least we approach the perfect democracy.

America, it is good to see, is rapidly becoming a land of monuments. Various civic organizations, municipalities, States, the Federal Government itself, sometimes in cooperation, sometimes each acting separately, are erecting columns and obelisks and statues to commemorate great events and to honor the memory of great men and women who have achieved things for humankind.

Some of these may be crude and inartistic, but back of them all lies the articulate spirit and purpose of a people, and it is magnificent. Every monument erected is in a way making stronger our institutions. It constitutes a perpetual reminder of what men have lived for and died for to work the weal of humanity.

We are reading just now of the rapidly culminating movement to restore and hold as an everlasting shrine the birthplace of Washington. To be sure, the fame of Washington does not at all require this for its perpetuation, but the movement is even above and beyond this; it is to express the profound feeling of a nation for the most conspicuous character in its formation and to give evidence of an unshakable purpose to preserve the institutions of government formulated under the guidance of his resolute mind and purposeful soul.

At another spot in Virginia a private organization, working under governmental auspices, is restoring and making secure the home of Jefferson—not as a monument to him, for he needs it not, but for the inspiration of mankind as a whole.

Out in a rural region of Kentucky the log cabin of a pioneer has been inclosed with a structure of marble and granite designed to defy the ravages of nature, so far as man can provide, to the end that the house in which Abraham Lincoln was born may be eternally preserved. We do not think of this as a monument to Lincoln but rather as a thing symbolic of the desire of America to give expression to the wish that the fundamental thing of her life—democracy—may be glorified and sanctified, and that hereafter as heretofore it is her desire and determination that in the Nation which Washington led to foundation and under the philosophy of government applied to it by the teachings of Jefferson, men like Lincoln shall have the opportunity of ascending to the summit of power and human glory.

The 11 men whose memory we are assembled to honor this day had their opportunity of service in the public affairs of such a nation. We can say of each of them that he seized the opportunity and strove to fill it, and did fill it, with a fine and intelligent and patriotic zeal. The life of each of them will receive from other colleagues a more specific and detailed treatment than time will admit of giving now.

It is good to be able to say of each that he enjoyed the unstinted respect and loyal love of those associated with him in the Nation's business. Each was fortunate enough to write his own name large upon the honorable roster of those who have served their country in this great arena and each left innumerable things for us to treasure until our time shall come to go forth and consort with them " in the shadows and the dust."

The quartet sang Still Will We Trust.

BENEDICTION

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following benediction:

Now, unto Him who is able to keep you from falling and present you faultless before the presence of His glory with great joy, unto the only wise God, our Savior, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

FRANK ROBERT GOODING

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, we are assembled to-day to pay tribute of love and respect to the memory of our colleagues who have passed to the Great Beyond during the present Congress.

It is an ideal but solemn custom. It serves to keep alive the spark of comradeship formed by close and friendly association. Without regard to political affiliations we are first and foremost servants of the people. We are bound by a common tie—to carry on as we see and understand our official obligations. We are molded by a single purpose—to legislate for the best interests of our great Republic. Little animosities may creep into the heat of debate, but they are promptly forgotten in our daily fellowship routine. But when the Grim Reaper stalks in and silently mows down a Member of either branch it casts over this body a feeling of depression. We are painfully conscious of our loss. There seems to be a void that can not be filled.

Mr. Speaker, it was my great pleasure and rare good fortune to be on terms of friendship with those whom death claimed during the present Congress. I should like to speak at length a eulogy on the life and public service of each. Others in more fitting form will perform that solemn duty.

In the time allotted me, Mr. Speaker, I shall attempt to trace briefly the career of the late Senator FRANK R. GOODING. The history of Idaho for the past 45 years would be incomplete without mentioning the conspicuous part played by Senator GOODING in the remarkable upbuilding of his adopted Commonwealth.

Sincerity of purpose, fidelity to every trust, rugged honesty, irreproachable character, progressive accomplishments, lofty ideals, unwavering fidelity constitute the solid foundation upon which this distinguished Idaho pioneer carved and builded the superstructure of his phenominal success. He narrowed to no degree, and resolutely brushed aside the stumbling blocks and obstacles which constantly beset his path in his early frontier struggles for recognition.

For FRANK R. GOODING there was no royal, rosy road to fame and fortune. He learned his lessons in the high school of hard knocks. His workshop was the wide, open spaces—prairie, mountain, stream. The courage and fortitude with which men were required to be endowed to stand the test of those gruelling days clung to Senator GOODING throughout his long, eventful, and colorful life.

Born in England, Senator GOODING as a child was brought by his parents to the United States in 1867. The Gooding family settled in Michigan, subsequently moving to California. Young Frank was then 17, a robust, sturdy youth. Four years later we find this young man of 21 located in the rugged mountainous Wood River mining district of Idaho Territory. He engaged in the business of furnishing the big mining companies with supplies which entered into their varied lines of operation.

From this beginning young GOODING took up farming, stock raising, banking, and real estate. Possessed of push and initiative, he became a leader in civic affairs. He was quick to grasp the splendid possibilities of the great unclaimed areas of south Idaho. The land was fertile and capable of producing a diversity of crops. Water for irrigation purposes was accessible in the numerous streams meandering toward the Great Snake River. It was young GOODING who opened up to settlement this rich new section. He dotted the unlimited area with homes and schools and towns, one of which was named in his honor. All this required capital. FRANK GOODING had it, and he invested it.

Strenuous as was his life in many commercial pursuits, Senator GOODING found time to enter the field of politics. This was his way of bringing about needed reforms. By sheer force of ability and resourcefulness he soon became a ruling factor in this line of public endeavor. He was chosen the leader of his party in the State senate. Throughout his tenure of several years he wore this mantle with increasing distinction. He introduced and engineered to enactment much remedial legislation.

By this time the electorate began to take notice of the young pioneer. In 1900 he was sent as a delegate to the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia, which renominated our late beloved President McKinley. It was at this convention that the dynamic Colonel Roosevelt was started on the road to the greatest fame and prestige an American has ever achieved in time of peace.

In 1902 Senator GOODING, who on numerous occasions had demonstrated his genius as a party leader and organizer, was selected as chairman of the Republican State central committee. He entered upon the task with the same indomitable will and spirit which had characterized all his successful undertakings.

The way he took up his responsibilities inspired confidence in his management of the campaign. When the smoke of that memorable political battle had cleared it was found that the 6-year control of the State had been wrested from the Democratic Party. This signal achievement paved the way for Senator GOODING's gubernatorial nomination in 1904. He was elected and reelected in 1906.

Governor GOODING applied to his administration the same hard and fast rules and principles which had made him a power in the field of private and commercial enterprise. During his régime many wise and beneficent laws were enacted. This focused on the State the attention of thousands of people seeking homes and business opportunities in the far Northwest. It was at this juncture that the great influx from the East had its inception. Many new enterprises and projects were opened up. Impetus was given in widening the scope and influence of the State institutions.

A number of knotty problems, such as labor strikes and disputes, mining troubles, and the assassination of Governor Frank Steunenberg were handled so satisfactorily by Governor GOODING as to bring upon him the unstinted praise and encomiums of the people of the Gem State. He had performed yeoman service.

We find this sturdy pioneer again plunging into commercial activities with the same zeal and zest that he had always shown in every worth-while endeavor, in which activity he continued until 13 years later, when he was appointed to the United States Senate by Governor D. W. Davis to fill an unexpired term.

On the 4th of March, 1921, he entered upon the full term to which he had been chosen in the election of 1920, at which time Hon. Warren G. Harding was elected to the Presidency. Senator GOODING was reelected to the Senate in 1926 by an increased majority.

Senator GOODING had a penchant for constructive work and was constantly planning for the development and upbuilding of the State. He craved seclusion in solving great State and national problems. In this respect I can best illustrate the remarkable capabilities of this able Senator by giving, in substance, the views of the well-known writer, T. M. Knappen, in Sunset Magazine for December, 1924:

> As a member of the Senate committee dealing with the tariff, Senator GOODING succeeded in simplifying all Republican tariff deliberations and bringing them to a harmonious and unanimous decision by adhering unswervingly to this simple and fair rule: "In tariff schedules do unto others as you would that they do unto you. Get your own and give the other fellow his; yea, in full measure."

On Wednesday, June 19, 1922, Senator GOODING delivered what was considered one of the ablest speeches on the subject of the tariff and manifested such keen familiarity and depth of learning in dealing with every phase of this great economic problem that he at once became known nationally as a tariff authority.

In the matter of railway transportation rates Senator GOODING, a member of the powerful Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, was foremost in his opposition to discrimination in freight rates. On this subject he delivered a speech in the Senate on May 14 and 16, 1924, covering in detail what he considered the "transportation menace."

The Senator, expressing impartially his well-known views, denounced the man who would deliberately impair the great railroad system of America as an undesirable citizen. At the same time he dealt just as severely with the railroads in seeking to exact the highest possible rate for carrying the product of the farm and range to market. He was an uncompromising advocate that the long haul be given no advantage over the short haul.

Governor GOODING cooperated toward the building of the great American Falls Dam in the Snake River of Idaho and was the prime factor in securing the adoption of the Gooding irrigation project. As a result of the enactment of these measures the prosperity of Idaho has been greatly enhanced. These accomplishments alone would stand as a monument to his zeal and fidelity in behalf of his State, and should forever link his name with the building of these far-reaching and stupendous enterprises for the good of mankind.

During his exceedingly busy career Senator GOODING never neglected his family. His estimable wife and three children and grandchildren were the objects of his adoration and devotion. On the occasion of his demise on June 24, 1928, at Gooding, Idaho, an ideal home life was ruthlessly disrupted.

Mr. Speaker, I feel my inability to adequately eulogize this rugged Idaho pioneer. He was my stanch friend, constituent, and counselor, whom I had known and admired for a third of a century. I had a wholesome regard for his breadth of knowledge and the perspicuity of his business and political judgment. Unlike the poet's eye "giving to airy nothing a local habitation and a name," Senator FRANK R. GOODING was first and last a materialist. He saw with clear-sighted vision the concrete substantial evidence of future possibilities and became one of the great architects and builders in shaping the destiny of the Gem of the Mountains.

Rolling back the years, I can visualize this hardy, sturdy pioneer, mounted on a fractious but fleet horse, riding over his cattle ranges, virtually dotting "a thousand hills"; I can picture him at night wrapped in his blanket sleeping under the canopy of the starlit heavens. I can see him covering and minutely inspecting his vast sheep ranges and directing with consummate skill and methodical precision the forces under his supervision. I can picture him riding into a pioneer town in south Idaho covered with a veneer of gray alkali dust.

This exceedingly busy man had for his motto these lines of the poet:

> The busy world shoves angrily aside
> The man who stands with arms akimbo set
> Until occasion tells him what to do.
> And he who waits to have his task marked out
> Shall die and leave his errand unfulfilled.

Mr. Speaker, Senator FRANK R. GOODING has gone to join that sturdy, courageous, undaunted group of pioneers who suffered the hardships incident to the opening up and development of the great West. Wherever Idaho, Gem of the Mountains, is spoken his name and his deeds will recur with loving remembrance.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, among the finest products of civilization is the man whose ideals are sound and who has strength of character to sustain him in the programs of life. The late United States Senator FRANK R. GOODING was such a man.

My colleague in the symposium of estimates upon the life of the late Senator GOODING is making available the details of the history of a great man from childhood on through the years of activity and usefulness, and until the shades of eventide had settled down. It is the story of hardship and privations in boyhood and early manhood; it is the story of the meeting of adversities with a smile, the overcoming of opposition through persistence, and the realization of successes in many lines in most unusual degree; it is the story, always epic, of battle and conquest.

Just as every tree has its distinctive features by which it is recognized, so every human life that is worth while has characteristics that bespeak the individual. The features that were dominant in the life of FRANK R. GOODING were devotion to his family and friends, loyalty to State and country, determination and resolution in purpose, indefatigable industry, a courage that was unflinching, and ability and resourcefulness that without asking quarter enabled him to carry a fight to the bitter end.

GOODING was successful as a stock grower and farmer, successful generally as a business man, interested in banking and other activities, a man who at all times was in the forefront of movements that had to do with the well-being of the community in which he lived, the State of his adoption, the section of country where his lot had been cast, and the Nation itself.

GOODING was a man whose conception of life was clear-cut, rugged, straightforward, and attained as a result of hard and trying experiences. He believed in good government. He believed in orderly processes. He believed in essential justice.

The public life of FRANK GOODING was not limited to positions of minor responsibility. He was a member of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; he was twice governor of his State; he was United States Senator.

GOODING AS SENATOR

In the United States Senate, within an incredibly short period of time, GOODING came to be recognized as one of the strong, virile leaders of the West. He was thoroughly informed upon all phases of the subjects of agriculture and transportation.

In any legislative body members soon learn to know the degree of information that their colleagues bring to the discussion of any subject. It has been said that "the world steps aside and lets pass the man who knows whither he is going." In this same spirit Members of the Senate and Members of the House of Representatives give ear to the man who knows the subject upon which he speaks.

Senator GOODING knew practically every phase of the agricultural problem. He knew not only the problem as it has to do with the boundary lines of the farm but he knew the problem as it has to do with marketing of crops and with meeting the crop output of foreign countries. Grounded in this subject, it is no wonder that Senator GOODING gave largely of his time in the United States Senate to meeting problems touching agriculture in the three ways that had to do with the subject as he saw it.

He stood for policies of helpfulness of the Federal Government that would be immediately effective upon the farm itself, policies that are carried forward so splendidly and efficiently through the Department of Agriculture.

He gave his time and thought to the problem of bringing the products of the farm to the consumer. In this connection it was a question of freight rates; it was a question of market control; it was a question of protection of the producer against speculation in the great centers of distribution.

Again he saw, as he believed, farmers reduced to peasantry unless by means that the Government itself could provide the economic situation of the farmer of America could be held separate and apart through tariff walls from the economic situation of the peoples of foreign lands. To all these purposes he gave his untiring support.

OFFICIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Senator GOODING had a profound conviction that the responsibility of a person charged with public office is not limited to reflecting a mere whim or passing sentiment of a constituency. He believed that the public official is trusted by the people who have asked him to assume a responsibility. He believed that the public official, by virtue of public office, is in better shape to meet the problems that concern the welfare of the constituency than those themselves who might be affected by the solution of those problems.

With this conviction he did not hesitate to go against seeming popular demand of the hour, to stand for the course that for the moment might be unpopular, if he believed that public opinion was wrong. It was his thought that the public official charged with solemn responsibility was in honor bound to use the means at his command to work out results, quite willing to trust to the future to demonstrate that his course was right, or at least that he was justified in following the course.

One of the fine virtues of man is loyalty. Senator GOODING was loyal to his friends. He was a partisan. It was not easy for him to believe that an enemy could be right. It was natural for him to believe that his friends could not be wrong. He would go to the limit for them, and he would sacrifice his own personal fortunes when the same were bound together with the fortunes of those who were his partisans.

AS GOVERNOR

As I see it the most profound impression made by GOODING upon his State and upon the country was not the impression that he made as United States Senator, as deep and abiding as that may be.

GOODING was greatest as the Governor of Idaho, and one event that occurred shortly after his induction into office lifted Governor GOODING from the plane of the chief magistrate of a State who was doing creditable work in routine business to a commanding leadership as governor of a State that attracted not only State interest and approval but national admiration and concern as well.

A former Governor of Idaho, the late Frank Steunenberg, was murdered in cold blood shortly after the beginning of the Gooding administration. Unquestionably the murder was brought about through the deliberate action of those who were antagonistic to the activities of Steunenberg while governor when he was endeavoring to sustain law and order. Those accused had the zealous support of intense partisans.

As GOODING saw the question, the crime was not limited to the murder of a man. The crime was an assault upon the State. It was an assault upon organized society. It was an assault upon civilization itself that centuries of time had been struggling to build.

Governor GOODING recognized that if the rights of man are to be respected, if human life is to be held precious, if the responsible officer of a State is to exercise the duties of his high office as only a man of integrity can exercise those duties, and not be subservient to a lawless element, he, as governor of the State, had a duty to perform in backing up the officers within the county and State charged with law enforcement. He gave to those officers support in unflinching degree.

The question of guilt or innocence of the accused is not involved in our consideration to-day. Unquestionably the accused recognized that substantial public opinion was against them. Unquestionably the governor and the people at large were in favor of giving the accused every right that a free people guarantees under our form of government. On the other hand, partisans of the accused, whether known to them or not, were indefatigable in their activities by way of defense. Some of these activities, whether known to the accused or not, were unworthy. Threats and intimidations were directed against the governor and against his family. Indeed, few men in public life, when called to meet a responsibility, have been harassed by such bitter and venomous opposition, by threats of death to self and loved ones, as was the lot of the then Governor of Idaho to meet. But GOODING was firm. His belief in good government, in orderly processes, had been challenged, but remained unshaken. He stood like a mighty rock against which dashed the waves of hatred and menace, but he never flinched—a lesson of the superb way in which the chief administrative officer of a sovereign State, charged with responsibility that goes with such position, should meet deliberate activities on the part of the enemies of organized society to thwart its will.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, a distinguished man has well observed that the life of every man may be well compared to a stream whose small beginning is plain to all but whose ultimate course and destination, as it widens through the expanse of years, only Divine Providence can discern. Is it to be a nameless brook, and will its tiny waters commingling with such others only increase the current of some noted river, or will it receive other rills and become a large river serving a great section of a country and be know far and wide?

This comparison is well exemplified in the life and character of our departed friend, Senator FRANK R. GOODING. Born in England, he came to this great country with many other immigrants. Who could have foretold when that your immigrant boy came to this country without wealth and unassisted by friends that he would become one of the distinguished citizens of his adopted State and that his voice would be heard among the statesmen of this Nation? His active and busy life presents an inspiring story of the result of hard work and honest endeavor. He early displayed that initiative and business foresight so necessary in the development of the great West. His business life brought him in contact with nearly every phase of life in the West. He was noted for his rugged honesty and fearless aggressiveness. Since coming to the Senate of the United States he has been a tireless worker for the great inland section of this country. He believed that that part of the United States which does not touch the sources of navigable waters was greatly handicapped in its struggle for industrial development, and he devoted much of his energy in the securing of legislation which he believed would prevent discrimination. In this he was bitterly opposed by strong influences and great wealth, but with characteristic fearlessness he attacked the problem and worked unceasingly until his health broke.

It is through the life and sacrifices of such men as Senator GOODING that States and nations progress and are made strong and great. The West particularly will long remember him as an able, fearless champion of that great section struggling to develop as other sections of the United States are developing. A poet has well expressed a thought worth perpetuating:

What builds a nation's pillars high
And makes it great and strong?
What makes it mighty to defy
The foes that 'round it throng?

Not gold, but only men can make
A nation great and strong;
Men who for truth and honor's sake
Hold still and suffer long.

Brave men who work while others sleep
Who dare when others sigh;
They build a nation's pillars deep
And lift it to the sky.

A man coming to Congress with a large business experience has many advantages in taking up his duties over those who prior to coming have had no such experience. Such a man has a different viewpoint than has a professional man, for example, and brings to the discharge of his duty knowledge which can be acquired only in the school of experience and business. Senator GOODING had a large experience before coming and he sought to apply that experience to the business of the Government. It is to be regretted that he was taken at a time when business experience is needed so much by those who shape the policies of the Government.

He sleeps to-day in the State he loved so well and for whose welfare he fought so valiantly. While we mourn his going, I feel sure that somewhere in the Great Beyond, where the physical bonds which limit our activities here have been cast aside, he is exercising his great attributes of progress and energy so characteristic of him here. In that environment where we hope that love and harmony are the ruling influences I have faith that he is finding a higher and sweeter pleasure in the society of old friends and loved ones than he experienced here. Let us all hope that in that better land the ambitions which often fail of realization here may be fully satisfied. As another has more beautifully expressed:

There is a mystic borderland that lies
Just past the limits of the workday world,
And it is peopled with the friends we met
And loved a year, a month, a week, a day,
And parted from with aching hearts; yet knew
That through the distance we must lose the hold
Of hand with hand, and only clasp the threads
Of memory. But still so close we feel this land,
So sure we are that these same hearts are true,
That when in waking dreams there comes a call
That sets the threads of memory aglow,
We know that just by reaching out the hand
In written words of love, or book, or flower,
The waiting hand will clasp our own once more
Across the silence in the same old way.

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, let me add, if I may, a few words of appreciation of the work and labors, qualities and character of the late Senator FRANK R. GOODING. For many years he represented the State neighboring on the west of my State of Wyoming. He was a faithful representative of the aspirations and needs of the Rocky Mountain region. His labors were great and arduous, representing as he did one of the States located in that section of the country which came in contact and had many matters with every department of the National Government. This included irrigation, forest reserves, Indian reservations, homesteads, roads, national parks and monuments, mineral lands, leases and permits, as well as pensions and compensations.

He was a most conspicuous defender of the interests of the great livestock industry of the West at all times, but his most important work during the later years of his life and during the last few sessions of Congress was in behalf of railroad rates in the Rocky Mountain region, specifically long and short haul, involving section 4 of the transportation act. Whether in agreement with his contention or not, that section 4 should be amended so that constant application of the railroads to change the through and local rates to the disadvantage of the mountain region would be prohibited, all must agree that he fought a good fight and kept the faith and dealt strong blows for a worthy cause.

Senator GOODING was sincere, direct, blunt, and forcible. His courage was unmistakable. His energy and persistency in following up what he considered to be right and just in legislation was, indeed, striking. His friends in the West have missed his counsel and his voice, and feel that a strong champion, both of western and of national interests, has been lost.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. FRANK R. GOODING the country at large, and especially the western half of the United States, lost a most valuable Member of the United States Senate. He was a contribution of the State of Idaho to the galaxy of great and useful men in public service. While he was commissioned by the people of Idaho as one of that State's Senators in the National Congress, the scope of his official activities was too comprehensive and far-reaching to be confined to the interests of his home State alone. He was truly a Senator of the United States and not merely a Senator from Idaho. The people of the Northwestern States especially felt that Senator GOODING was their Senator as well as the Senator of Idaho. Speaking in response to the feelings of my own heart and also as a Representative from the State of Washington, I can not withhold my tribute to this distinguished man of Idaho and great American statesman.

The intelligence of his passing from this life last June fell upon sad hearts throughout the Nation. The people of my own district felt as keenly as did the people of Idaho the loss sustained in the death of Senator GOODING. He was a man of the people. He knew from personal experience and actual contact their economic problems. He had their viewpoint and approached these problems with an attitude of sympathy for the people's interest.

Senator GOODING was an eminently practical man. He made a success of his own business enterprises. He was not a theorist dealing in mere abstractions. He dealt with public affairs and governmental problems in a practical way. He was fair. He was honest. He knew what was right for the people to have. He knew when they were getting it and when they were not. He believed in the principle of square dealing. His life and legislative record were based upon this principle. He was a man of deep convictions and unfaltering courage. He was close to the people, believed in their rights and espoused their cause. He sought results, for with him only results counted. He was not discouraged by temporary failure to attain the goal of his efforts, but always returned to the fight with renewed vigor and determination.

Senator GOODING's term in the United States Senate, counted by years, was not of long duration; but, measured by service in things attempted and results accomplished, it is comparable in volume with that of a long duration in years. I shall not discuss in detail the scope of Senator GOODING's public service. Suffice it for me to say that he has endeared himself for all time in the hearts of the people of the intermountain sections of the West and Northwest through his ceaseless and untiring efforts to bring economic equality to agriculture and to abolish freight-rate discriminations against the commerce of that hinterland. The names "GOODING" and "Gooding bill" are household words among our people there.

Senator GOODING's health was undermined by his arduous work and close attention to his public duties. And now his labors are finished. He sowed that others might reap. He needs no monument of marble to perpetuate his memory among his people or my people. The consciousness of his unselfish service and gratitude for his sacrificing devotion to their interests have implanted in their hearts a love of his memory more enduring than any shaft of stone.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Senator FRANK R. GOODING the West lost a strong advocate, a Christian worker, and a man interested in every civic enterprise.

Senator GOODING was a progressive westerner, a "typical westerner"—a man who started with no financial means but with willing hands and a courageous heart.

Born in England, Senator GOODING came to America when 8 years of age. He received his early education in Michigan and spent his early manhood in California, settling in Idaho shortly after he became of age.

Senator GOODING will be remembered for his efforts in the betterment of the community in which he lived and carved out his fortune. As a mining contractor, homesteader, and livestock man he was known well and favorably throughout the State. As his business prospered and expanded his influence in the field of politics resulted in his being chosen chairman of the Idaho State central committee and his election as governor of the State followed in 1905 and 1908. In November, 1920, Mr. GOODING was elected United States Senator.

We of the West will long remember Senator GOODING as the outstanding advocate of the long and short haul bill which sought to prohibit a higher freight rate for a short haul than for a long haul through the same territory.

In the way of legislation he always stood for what would, in his opinion, be of benefit to the West, yet, at the same time, he always viewed with statesmanlike consideration the influence such legislation would have on the balance of the country.

It has been well said that Senator FRANK R. GOODING is among the men who are justly entitled to be enrolled with the makers of the great commonwealth of Idaho, whose residence there has left its impress upon the entire Northwest.

WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, among the names of those departed Members of the House of Representatives to whom we are paying honor to-day is that of Hon. WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE. I never knew Mr. VAILE personally until we both had been elected to Congress in the election of 1918. But in the following nine years I grew to know him intimately and to love him as a brother. Rarely in all my life have I found a more congenial spirit, a more agreeable companion, a more likable man than was BILLY VAILE, as he was known to his many good friends.

WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE was born June 22, 1876, at Kokomo, Ind. His parents were Joel Frederick Vaile and Charlotte (White) Vaile. In 1881 the family moved to Denver, Colo. His father became a noted lawyer of Colorado and was a member of the law firm of Wolcott, Vaile & Waterman. The senior partner of this law firm, Hon. Edward O. Wolcott, was a distinguished United States Senator from Colorado from 1889 to 1901. The junior member of the firm, Hon. CHARLES W. WATERMAN, was elected to the United States Senate in 1926.

Young VAILE grew up in Denver, which was his home until he passed on to the Great Beyond. He attended the public schools in Denver, attended Yale University, from which institution he graduated in 1898 with the degree of bachelor of arts. Later he attended the law school of the University of Colorado and Harvard Law School. In 1901 he was admitted to the Colorado bar and began the practice of law in Denver. He was married June 15, 1915, to Mrs. Kate Rothwell Varrell, who, with one son, survives him.

While a senior at Yale University he enlisted as a private in Battery A, Connecticut Volunteer Field Artillery, and served as such throughout the war with Spain in 1898. In 1916 he was again in the military service on the Mexican border as lieutenant of Infantry, United States National Guard of Colorado. In the fall of 1916, while in service on the Mexican border, he was nominated by the Republican Party for Representative in Congress for the first district of Colorado. He could not or did not leave the service to take part in the political campaign. That was the year that the slogan "He kept us out of war" helped to elect a Democratic President and a number of Democratic Congressmen. Mr. VAILE was not elected that year.

In 1918 Mr. VAILE was again nominated for Congress by the Republicans of his district and elected by a substantial majority. He was reelected in 1920, 1922, and 1924 and 1926. He was serving his fifth consecutive term as Representative in Congress for the first congressional district of Colorado when taken by death.

As a Member of Congress Mr. VAILE was diligent, energetic, popular, and influential. His first assignment to committees was as a member of three—Expenditures in the Treasury Department, Immigration and Naturalization, and Public Lands. The immigration question raised important issues in the Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Congresses, and Mr. VAILE took a prominent and influential part in writing the immigration laws that are now on the statute books of the country. He became exceedingly well versed on matters pertaining to immigration and was much in demand for addresses on this subject over the country. Being a lawyer of ability and having practiced law in a public-land State, he was a valuable addition to the Committee on Public Lands. In the Sixty-eighth Congress he was put on an additional committee, World War Veterans' Legislation, and helped to write some of the legislation of interest to veterans of the World War. In the Sixty-ninth Congress Mr. VAILE was honored with a place on the Committee on Foreign Affairs. This being an exclusive committee, members not being permitted to serve on any other committee, he had to resign from the other committees. He felt that most of the big work in connection with the immigration question had been accomplished and he desired the opportunity for study and activity in the broader field of foreign affairs.

It was not generally known among his colleagues that Mr. VAILE was a writer of short stories and fiction. He produced several stories of merit, and was in line for larger development. Among his stories was published in book form The Mystery of the Golconda.

Mr. VAILE stood high and held important places in Masonic circles of Colorado. He was made a Master Mason on July 8, 1911, in Union Lodge, No. 7, A. F. and A. M., at Denver, Colo. The following year he helped organize the lodge at Arvada, a near Denver suburb, where he was living at the time. He served in all the important stations up to worshipful master in this lodge, in which he retained his membership.

He was made a Royal Arch Mason in Colorado Royal Arch Chapter, No. 29, at Denver, on September 27, 1911, and later he filled various offices in that chapter. He was created a Knight Templar in Denver Commandery, No. 25, K. T., at Denver, on January 30, 1912. He received the cryptic degrees in Denver Council, No. 1, R. and S. M., at Denver, in 1913. The degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, from the fourth to the thirty-second, inclusive, were conferred upon him by the No. 1 bodies of that rite, in Denver, in November, 1912.

In the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of Colorado he was appointed senior grand deacon in 1920. He was elected junior grand warden in 1921, senior grand warden in 1922, deputy grand master in 1923, and on September 16, 1924, the 30,000 Masons of his State, through their representatives in grand lodge assembled, conferred upon him the highest honor in their power to bestow by electing him grand master of Masons in Colorado. He filled the office of grand master for one year, visiting many of the lodges and officiating at many public Masonic functions, at all times inculcating the fundamental principles of Freemasonry; and the good effects of his work will long be felt by the Masonic fraternity in the State of Colorado.

Mr. VAILE was interested in travel and had traveled much over this country and in foreign lands. After the adjournment of the Sixty-ninth Congress on March 4, 1927, he and Mrs. Vaile visited Europe, spending much time in Spain. He had been at home only a few days when on a drive up in the mountains near Denver on July 2, 1927, he suddenly and without warning was stricken by the hand of death. "Heart trouble," the doctors said.

He was taken from us at the age of 51—in the prime of life. Short as his time had been he had made a success at the law, had served his country as a soldier in two wars, had reached high standing in Masonic circles, had served in Congress nine years, was author of marked ability. He was a devoted father, a loyal husband, and a good friend to many. He had lived and he had served.

I attended the funeral in Denver, Wednesday afternoon, July 6, 1927. The religious services were held at the First Congregational Church, Masonic services at Fairmont Cemetery. Impressive was the tribute his friends silently paid him on that day—thousands coming from all sections of the city and State and from every walk of life. Many were there who said "He did me a good turn." The words of the parson were fine and the Masonic ceremonies impressive. But the deep-down feeling that ran through the minds of all was that WILL VAILE had been the friend of his fellow man.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, as his former associates and friends we meet to-day to bear testimony to the life, character, and public services, and to pay a last tribute of respect to the memory of WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE.

It was my good fortune to be acquainted with him almost from his boyhood days, and I always had a most kind and friendly feeling toward him.

He was one of the most likable men I have ever known, and I shall always be proud of our friendship and intimate association during his over eight years' service in Congress.

He was a most genial friend, a kind and affectionate husband, and a loving and indulgent father. He came from good stock. His father, Hon. Joel Frederick Vaile, was one of the greatest lawyers and finest gentlemen our State has ever produced. He had a thorough education at the University of Colorado and at Harvard and Yale.

Nature lavished upon our departed friend many of her choicest gifts. He had a splendid physique. He was a fine-looking, manly man. Nature endowed him with an exceptionally brilliant mind that was like a rare gem, many sided and all of them bright. He was a man of great possibilities. He had a magnetic personality. His all-pervading good nature made him a welcome addition to any group of his fellows. He had a joyous and charming twinkle in his eyes and an inborn geniality that was akin to genius. He was a man of cheerful yesterdays, optimistic to-days, and confident to-morrows.

He was a bold and valiant fighter for whatever he believed to be right. He never shunned a political or forensic or any other kind of a strife. But with him it was always a manly combat.

It was those rare traits that endeared him to everyone who knew him. He had a very unusual and distinctively marked gift of a naturally bright, pleasing smile and a happy disposition. He was a buoyant spirit that radiated good cheer.

In the terrific rush and tragedy of our everyday life we sincerely mourn only the red-blooded, kind-hearted, unselfish, and genuine good fellow. They are the ones whose memories we secretly cherish and preserve with the most heartfelt tributes and beautifully eloquent eulogies.

Our personal sorrow, genuine grief, and lasting sadness are reserved for those very few of the sunny, cheerful, big-hearted disposition of WILL VAILE. He was a fine grown-up boy.

He scattered flowers along the trail of life. He plucked many a thistle and planted a rose. He had the inestimable gift of a never-failing sense of humor and a genuine and natural love for all mankind.

I adopt a few expressions from his tribute to Champ Clark on March 3, 1921—the day after he died—when he commenced his address by saying:

> I am sorry that I could not have said this instead of writing it. It is the sort of thing which I believe should be spoken rather than written.

And closed by saying:

> I lost a friend yesterday. But I have lived long enough to lose many friends. What is much worse is that my little boy has lost a friend. So has every American boy.

And I will apply to him his own words on April 18, 1926, in his memorial address on Congressman John E. Raker, of California, when he said:

> He had a warm heart himself, a most lovable and human disposition. He loved his fellow men, not theoretically and philosophically but with a lively personal affection.
> His virtues were positive, not negative virtues. He was healthily and humanly partisan—vigorously so, because he could not be anything without being vigorous in it. But both sides of the House respected him, both sides loved him, and he belonged to both sides.

He was the kind of a man you would want for a partner or a friend. He was a stalwart, positive, patriotic American.

As I sat on the floor of the House and listened to him delivering that eloquent eulogy, the thought passed through my mind that he might possibly some day in the not far-distant future be addressing the House and saying kind words about my departure, which I know he would have done. But I never had the slightest thought in the world that I would ever be paying a tribute of affection to his memory.

He was always a loyal and affectionate son of his beautiful home city of Denver, and "the queen city of the mountains and plains" was always proud of him.

The vast multitude of friends of the Vaile family will earnestly hope that his only child, Joel Frederick Vaile, may grow up to be an honor to our State and a credit to his father and mother and his illustrious grandfather.

The old adage that "Death loves a shining mark" was tragically exemplified when, on July 2, 1927, at the zenith of his young and vigorous manhood, on the very crest of the great Continental Divide of this hemisphere, far above timberline, at the top of Milner Pass, in the Rocky Mountain National Park, at en elevation of 12,000 feet, without a moment's warning his heart suddenly stopped and the angel of death beckoned him from us. From that bald and barren pinnacle his lovable soul took its flight into eternity. I trust the place will be suitably marked some time. From that scenic spot one can see as far as the human eye can reach, to the east down the Atlantic slope toward the plains of Kansas, and to the west down the Pacific slope toward the Blue Mountains in Utah. No such marvelous view can be obtained in any of the other 20 national parks.

Every death is a tragedy, even when it occurs late in life and from natural causes. But the instantaneous death of our colleague in the midst of health, happiness, and hope, was a profound shock to the entire State of Colorado. He was always an industrious Congressman and a faithful public servant. He vigorously worked for woman suffrage, prohibition, a good Army and Navy, and was active in a great many matters. Even a brief mention of all his activities would require many pages. He was instinctively high-minded and always had patriotic and noble ideals. He was a splendid grand master of the Colorado Masons. He played the game of life on the level and on the square.

To my mind, by far the greatest service he rendered to our country was his many years of desperately hard, painstaking, conscientious and alert work on the Immigration Committee. Every ounce of his strength of mind and body was genuinely loyal to Uncle Sam every minute of his 51 years. He loved his country. He was American-minded. His whole soul believed in America for Americans. He made many splendid speeches in Congress and delivered hundreds of patriotic lectures throughout the country on the subject of the national-origins method of calculating the basis of immigration quotas, and he was a tower of strength in the long and persistent efforts that finally brought about our present immigration and naturalization laws. His great speech of April 5, 1924, has been quoted ever since for its force and learning. The public generally have no idea of the courage, energy, and determination, day and night, year in and year out, that work required. He is justly entitled to a very large share of the credit for the enactment of those laws. For that great patriotic service our country and our Centennial State will forever owe him a debt of gratitude. Our Nation and our State are better for his having lived.

With sad hearts for the death of this dear friend we stand upon the shore of the silent river, and with mortal, tearful eyes we strive in vain to pierce the mists that rest upon its bosom and that enshrouds the silent boatman and our departed friend upon his voyage to the unseen shore. As we watch and wait, the listening ear can hear the muffled dipping sound of the returning oar; and at our feet the breaking of the rippling waves upon the sands remind us that soon from out those mists there will be seen the determined face of the ever-returning boatman, bearing the summons that we must all obey.

When one thinks of the death of our late colleague there irresistibly comes to his memory the familiar lines from the favorite poem of Lincoln:

> Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
> Like a swift-fleeting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
> A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
> Man passes from life to his rest in the grave.

I always thought he would live to a grand old age and possibly go to the United States Senate from our State some time. But an inexorable fate beyond our comprehension willed it otherwise. We can not comprehend the all-wise plan of Him who controls the destinies of us all and who holds us in the hollow of His hand.

In the incoming Seventy-first Congress of 531 Members (96 Senators and 435 Representatives), soon to convene, there will be only 5 Senators and 7 Representatives who have served continuously more than 20 years.

Two hundred and forty-two former Senators and eleven hundred and sixty former Members of this House and twenty-four Delegates and Commissioners have answered the final roll call and passed to the Great Beyond during the past 20 years, since I came to Congress on March 4, 1909. Of that number, 54 Senators and 130 Representatives have died in active service here during that time. Of those Members and ex-Members, 13 of them were from Colorado, Senator Henry M. Teller, Senator Thomas M. Patterson, Senator Charles J. Hughes, Senator John F. Shafroth, Senator Samuel D. Nicholson, Representative James B. Belford, Representative Franklin E. Brooks, Representative George W. Cook, Representative Lafayette Pence, Representative Atterson W. Rucker, Representative Harry H. Seldomridge, Representative WILLIAM N. VAILE, and our first Territorial Delegate in Congress, Hiram P. Bennet.

It has been my rare and very great pleasure and privilege to have known and associated with most of all those great Americans. Many of them were profound scholars, statesmen of international fame, and orators equal to any that the human race has ever produced, and really great men in the highest sense of the word. Those 1,426 men who once occupied these seats in Congress were earnest and conscientious patriots. And, sad to say, a large percentage of all those who have served here during the past 15 years have, in my judgment, passed to their reward prematurely. But their lives were a stimulus to their comrades and will forever be an inspiration to those who follow in their footsteps. Those with whom we have associated were friends of ours. We know them well and we mourn them sincerely. We measure them more accurately and justly after they have departed.

When we reach the hilltop of life and begin to look down the western slope into the closing years we realize more fully than ever what the character, the ambitions, the struggles, the disappointments, the hopes, the services, and the lives of all those comrades have meant to our beloved country, and we appreciate them more and more as the years go by.

The mysteries of life we no more understand than the mysteries of death. The miracle of birth and the mystery of death remain the unsolved problems of all time. What a wonderful moving-picture show is this brief life of ours!

> We are such stuff as dreams are made of,
> And our little life is rounded with a sleep.

We are all going this way only once. Let us go it like loyal and worthy sons of our sovereign States and our great Republic, and salute the everlasting good, and be grateful for all the blessings we have.

When the future historians of our State shall write the faithful record of the men who made Colorado truly great, the name of WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE, scholar, lawyer, soldier, statesman, orator, author, faithful public servant, loyal son of Colorado, kind, unselfish, big-hearted, generous, genial gentleman, will shine with a brilliant luster among our State's great upbuilders.

May the remains of our cherished friend rest in the sanctuary of a lovingly protected tomb, guarded by our eternal peaks, and wrapped in the dreamless drapery of timeless peace until the resurrection morn.

Lovable WILL VAILE, hail and farewell!

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I feel that there is nothing that I can worthily add to what has to-day been said of the remarkable career of WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE. The simple, unadorned story of his life is the highest, most fitting eulogy.

If permitted to pursue my own inclination, instead of addressing you I would be a silent participant in these exercises, communing with my own great sorrow in the loss of one who was closer and dearer than a friend, one for whom I entertained an affection and admiration equal to that of a brother.

In committee assignments, which are such important factors in shaping careers in the House of Representatives, Mr. VAILE played a leading rôle. Upon first coming to Congress he was assigned to the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, the Public Lands, the Committee on Irrigation, and later to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

There never lived a man who more devoutly believed that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," or more clearly perceived that in these days of intense competition the great majority of mankind are so busily striving to earn a livelihood for themselves and their dependents as to leave them no opportunity to study the underlying principles of government. And there he considered it his solemn duty to help to the utmost of his power, so to arouse the people to the vital importance of principle that they might never, through ignorance or indifference, permit liberty to be smothered in material prosperity. And in this regard he played no minor part in placing on the statute books our present immigration laws.

His whole existence was hallowed with the love of his Creator and man, and consecrated with helpfulness of those in distress and cheer for those struggling out of despair. Ever dedicated to the cause of human freedom, he struck off the shackles of unmerciful dominion wherever he found them.

When momentous questions confronted him never did he render a decision calculated to square him with popular approbation. He sought his Maker for his counselor and not his electorate, and ofttimes when confiding in divine Providence he was severely criticized.

He had a heart as courageous as a lion, declining no conflicts and fearing no danger. The fiercer the conflict the more resolute he became. His moral courage was equal to his physical courage. He never evaded an issue; he never shirked a responsibility; at times carrying this splendid virtue to a point almost beyond the limits of prudence and discretion. No man of my acquaintance surpassed him in the manly virtue of courage, both moral and physical.

He possessed a persistency and perseverance of purpose which would have attained distinction in any vocation of life selected. When he reached a conclusion in the course of life no obstacles could deter him in continuous effort to reach the attainment. He was the personification of tireless energy and determined effort. His industry was as much an element in his success as were his moral and intellectual qualities. From early youth to his death his life was one of ceaseless activity.

Only those who are actively engaged in public life know its heavy exactions, its ceaseless wear and tear, its continuous mental and physical strain, all of which must finally end in a shattered constitution unable to sustain the heavy burden. WILL VAILE'S death bears testimony to his unselfish and patriotic devotion to public duties regardless of personal consequences.

WILL VAILE'S intellectual attainments were of rare excellence. He possessed a strong masculine mind, fully capable of logical reasoning and of reaching safe and sensible conclusions. He was thoughtful and gave public questions full and conscientious examination and consideration. He was a ready and aggressive debater and an attractive, instructive, and entertaining speaker. He was highly educated and splendidly read in history, literature, and law.

My friends, in conclusion, let us all so conduct our lives that when the time comes for us to depart we can calmly and serenely face death as did our colleague.

When I am in places where I have met and associated with WILL VAILE I recall memories of pleasant contacts, and the words of an immortal writer keep harping in my mind:

I feel like one who treads alone
Some banquet hall deserted.

Not alone, however, for the spirit of WILL VAILE is still among us. He would like to speak to you and to me. We can not hear him, or touch him, and at times the haunting words of Tennyson recur to me:

Oh, for the touch of a vanished hand,
The sound of a voice that is still.

My colleague, yours is the vanished hand. Yours the voice that we can no longer hear upon this earth. But memories of your noble endeavors, of your geniality, and of our pleasant associations shall linger so long as we survive.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, "in the midst of life we are in death" has been exemplified in all too large a measure during the past few months in this House. The roster of our beloved colleagues on both sides of this aisle who have answered the summons which must come to us all has left us helpless in the face of the mystery and the majesty of death.

When I came to this House with a limited legislative experience in my great State of New York, I was permitted association with the men who represent the many component Commonwealths of the Nation which go to make our cosmopolitan country the greatest in all the world. Slowly but surely by elimination we select from the membership those of our number with whom we form personal friendships and association. From this group 10 years ago it was my good fortune to come into close contact with my friend, Hon. WILLIAM N. VAILE, the man that was ever the boy, who always loved to have his friends about him in order that he might recite the story of his favorite State of Colorado. How many precious hours I have spent under the spell of this poet and writer who loved the mountain country, its peaks, its wonders. None other could recite with more attraction the marvels of the Rockies and the grandeur of its scenic beauty, the land that has become America's playground.

Mr. Speaker, BILLY VAILE (the name by which I affectionately called him for the years we were permitted to be companions) has entered the silent portals and upon the long journey from which the traveler never returns. His mortal career is ended, his spiritual existence begun. He gave his all to the service of his country and drew unnecessarily upon his physical resources until exhausted nature sought repose beneath its kindred earth. Among the peaks of those hills of which he wrote so beautifully and to whose praises his voice and his pen were so successfully devoted, he gave up his fine spirit and went to meet his Creator "who giveth and taketh away."

The great State which he served in this House with distinction and with honor will long hold his name in reverence for the reflected glory his work has placed upon the pages of its history. He was at once a writer and a statesman and stood among us in full stature fitted in every way to trod these halls which have been immortalized by the giants of genius and intellect which have gone before and await in the silent halls of the great unknown.

Mr. Speaker, this is my humble though sincere and inadequate tribute to the man and the friend whom I hope some day to meet in the land of rest and happiness where there will be no sorrow and there will be no parting.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM VAILE is gone but not forgotten. He has finished his labors here on earth and has now gone to labor in a larger and finer realm. He leaves behind him memories which those of us who knew him well will cherish through the remainder of our earthly existence.

I met him first when I came to Congress to attend the special session in April, 1921. He was at that time a member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which committee I became a member in the Sixty-seventh Congress. I soon learned that he took his work seriously and always had something worth while to contribute in the study of the problems that came before us. He had a genial manner and a pleasant smile. He could advocate a cause without losing his temper. His colleagues might disagree with him but he never maintained any resentment. He granted to each man the right to think and act according to the dictates of his own conscience. He never tried to influence by force or threat, but, instead, used reason and facts and able presentation.

It was during the time that he was a member of this committee that much of the legislation was considered and passed which will through the ages stand as a protection to America. He thoroughly believed in restricted immigration and advocated it as a fundamental necessity for the perpetuation of our American ideals and institutions.

Men of the type of WILLIAM VAILE are needed in public office to-day, and if all who are fortunate enough to represent this great country in the Halls of Congress can have the fine ideals and sincere determination to put these into effect, which were held by him, our country will long endure.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, Mr. VAILE remains in the memory of his friends a man at all times courteous and considerate of others. While he was born in the great Mississippi Valley, he early removed to Colorado. He was essentially a man from the West. He had strong, decided views on the various subjects which came before Congress, but always in his references and in his consideration of his opponent he preserved a rare degree of politeness and thoughtfulness for them. He was by inclination and training a real student and had attended a number of the leading universities of the United States, graduating from the Yale University. He became a distinguished member of the bar in his adopted State.

As a statesman he was noted for the breadth of his views and his grasp of national and international relations. His thoughts and actions were not bounded by civil divisions, but included the whole United States and its relation with other countries. Mr. VAILE seemed never to tire but displayed great persistency in his advocacy of beneficial measures for his State and his Nation.

It was my privilege to serve with him on a great committee of the House which deals particularly with problems arising in the West. He knew the needs of the people whom he represented and worked in season and out, with rare persistence and tact, for legislation beneficial to Colorado and to the entire West. Later he voluntarily relinquished his membership on a number of committees to become a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I talked with him often concerning his work in that field. He was particularly concerned over the welfare and growth of the great Latin-American Republics at the south. I feel sure that had he been permitted to live he would have distinguished himself in the field of foreign affairs.

The loss of such a man is not only felt by this body but it is a loss to the people of the Nation. He was a student and keen debater, gifted with the ability to express his thoughts. He also coupled with it a keen understanding of the question which he undertook to discuss. The people of his district and State will miss him and mourn his loss. His companions here deeply mourned his sudden and untimely death. In the very zenith of his power and in the midst of his life of activity he was suddenly called to the Great Beyond. We are grateful for the work he did here. In many respects a sudden death is to be desired. For the one to go it is better for the grim warrior of death to strike down his victim when he is surrounded by his loved ones than to sap his strength by slow degrees while he lies suffering in the dreary sick room. Personally I can only feel that all is well with our departed friend. Somehow I feel sure that his lot is in keeping with his ideas and aspirations here.

Life is real! life is earnest!
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul.

We all must soon join that "innumberable caravan" moving to the other side. As the poet says:

Life's shores are shifting
Every year,
And we are seaward drifting
Every year.

Old places, changing, fret us,
The living more forget us;
There are fewer to regret us
Every year.

But the truer life grows nigher
Every year.
Earth's hold on us grows lighter,
And the heavy burdens lighter
And the dawn immortal brighter
Every year.

It is for us who remain to carry on as he would have us do. He loved his Nation and served it well in times of peace and in times of war. He left to his family the rich heritage of a good name and a good record of public service. Peace to his memory.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, the Grim Reaper, whose summons each and every one of us must answer sooner or later, has been very active among the membership of this body during the present session, and many of our colleagues have been called to take that long and unreturnable journey, to the grief and dismay of those of us who came to admire and respect their ability and statesmanship and to appreciate and value their friendship.

One of the real pleasures that have been my inestimable good fortune from the time I was first permitted the honor of representing a part of my great State in this House has been the fellowship and close association with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

The definite and permanent separation of these friends from time to time fills me with poignant grief and leaves a void in my life that can never be filled. No one can estimate more adequately than I from personal experience how great an honor membership in this House confers. It is the greatest legislative body in the world, because it enacts the laws that govern the greatest of all peoples. Here we meet in daily association men—and lately ladies, too—who come from all sections of our marvelous Republic, the most wonderful ever conceived in the mind of man. In this way we form friendships which bind us close and which endure the remainder of our lives, whether we remain in Congress or retire to private pursuits.

Among those whose voice was heard in this Chamber and whom I learned to appreciate, respect, and admire during my service was WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE, to whose memory and qualities I am making this very futile and inadequate effort to pay my humble tribute.

He was my friend, and I mourn his passing. A great and altogether lovable figure who came among us from the mighty West, he was among the first, although of opposite political affiliation, to reach out to me in my elementary stage the hand of fellowship and to guide aright my footsteps in order that I might best serve my country and my constituency.

WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE brought to his great work a ripe experience and a rare degree of judgment and legal acumen. His life was one of activity, of usefulness, of service.

He was born in Kokomo, Ind., on June 22, 1876, when America was celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Nation. After an elementary school education, he obtained an A. B. degree in Yale University in 1898, following with a course as special student in the law department of the University of Colorado. He completed his education in Harvard during the years 1899–1901 and began the practice of law in the latter year in his adopted city with the firm of Vaile, McAllister & Vaile, where he made an enviable reputation.

His work during the years of his membership in the House was devoted to activities on the Committees on the Public Lands, Immigration and Naturalization, Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and finally on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with which I have the honor of being connected. Here it was across the committee table in closer contact than the larger membership of the House affords that I grew to know and prize his worth.

The record of WILLIAM NEWELL VAILE on our committee, as in the House, was ever one of courage, determination, and diligence. He was always willing to grasp any opportunity for service to his district and his country. He was a cultured, polished gentleman, open and frank, and direct at all times and in all things. A fair and square debater, he stood manfully for those things in which he believed without rancor or partisanship to his adversaries.

Adding to his achievements which lent lustre to his great record and renown to his fame and his memory, Mr. VAILE enlisted and served as a volunteer private during the Spanish-American War, and he saw active service on the Mexican border.

He laid down the burden of a life all too young during which he served his country in the field as a soldier, and in the Halls of Congress as a legislator and a statesman. He stepped out upon the great unknown highway with the courage that characterized his life. He brings to my mind a poem I read in a western newspaper of a columnist who, two hours before he departed for the great and final divide, wrote this memorial epitaph of himself:

The doctor knows what his trained eyes see,
And he says, it's the last of the ninth for me;
One more swing as it's growing dark,
And then I must leave this noisy park;
'Twas a great game from the sound of the bell,
With good plays, bad plays, and plays pell mell,
The speed of it burned my heart away,
But I thank the Lord that he let me play.

It was in this spirit that he left us. He died among the great mountains of the western country he loved so well. We know that that night which carried the dread announcement saw many sad hearts and many sorrowful homes where the man and his deeds will be held in loving memory for the good he wrought.

Here we will spread on the record of this Congress forever these testimonials to his high character, his sound patriotism, and his many talents, so that the young men and the young women of this land of ours forever after will broaden their respect for our great country and those who strove to serve and preserve it.

Mild and gentle as he was brave,
When the sweetest love of his life he gave
To simple things; where the violets grew
Pure as the eyes they were likened to;
The touches of his hands have strayed
As reverently as his lips have prayed;
When the little brown thrush that harshly chirred
Was dear to him as the mockingbird;
And he pitied as much as a man in pain
A writhing honeybee wet with rain.
Think of him still as the same, I say,
He is not dead—he is just away.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I take pleasure in saying a word of the services of the Hon. WILLIAM N. VAILE, a former Member of the House of Representatives from Colorado. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which he, too, was a member,

I came in fairly close contact with him for a brief period. That contact caused me to entertain a high opinion of him. He possessed a directness of attack upon any problem in which he was interested and a vigor of understanding of issues which caused his opinions to be highly respected by the committee. Coupled with this directness of attack and vigor of thinking were a sincerity of utterance and a soundness of judgment which made him a much respected member.

To the qualifications of an able, diligent, and devoted public servant he added the qualities of a genial gentleman in all his personal relations.

The Congress can ill spare men of his kind.

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity to say a word, though briefly, as to the life and character of Hon. WILLIAM N. VAILE, a former Representative in this body of the State of Colorado. Mr. VAILE's district and residence were in the city of Denver, Colo., but a few miles distant, as we reckon distance in the West, from the city of Cheyenne, Wyo., the capital of my State. Our districts were not contiguous, but in the same section of the country, representing as it were the combination of plains with irrigation and agriculture and the mountains with their great mining industries. In a large sense we represented similar interests.

As a legislator, however, probably his most important contribution to the welfare of the country was his work on the Committee on Immigration. He had an important part in the framing, reporting, and passage of the immigration bill of 1924, and the subsequent amendments.

Personally, he was companionable, sociable, and interesting. He had traveled much and studied foreign languages, being of a literary turn of mind. This added to the charm of his conversation and discussions, and led to the writing and publication of a most interesting western work of fiction, having as its basis the gold-mining industry.

In his death we have lost a good American, a fine citizen, and a helpful legislator.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, like many other Members of the House, I felt a keen loss in the passing of Hon. WILLIAM N. VAILE, of Colorado. He was a lovable character—the same always, wherever one met him, and with this splendid quality he also possessed outstanding ability. I had the honor of serving on committees with him and was in a position to know and admire his sterling qualities.

His passing has left a void not easily filled, and I miss his kindly face and manner as I go about my public duties, as do many other Members of the House. He is missed no less as a friend than as a colleague.

MARTIN BARNABY MADDEN

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Speaker, we stand at the bier of one whose life has been chiefly devoted to public service. In the minds of all—rising even above the grief at the loss of a dear friend and associate—is the continuing thought of the greatness of that service and the self-sacrifice it entailed.

The life of our friend from his early days in poverty to the day of his death has been one of unremitting toil. No sooner had his industry and ability relieved him, in his earlier days, of the necessity of manual work than he turned with indefatigable industry to public service, for his city and State at first, and then for our Government. His life is the familiar American epic of the rise from humble and hard circumstances to the heights of power in our great Republic. But upon this solemn occasion we who have been his associates and know his work and its burdens, borne in their full measure at all times, especially during the last few years, when at one elbow sat public responsibility and at the other expected death, may draw from his life the lesson of true statesmanship.

In such an hour as this our inner minds form that last final judgment of the life, character, and accomplishments of a dead friend. It is probably the only entirely impartial judgment which we have ever passed upon him. We do not always give verbal expression of it, for, as the Roman says, such always must be good. But, as each one of us knows, the judgment of a life in retrospect is that which endures. "A tree is best measured when it is down."

The rise of a man to a position of power and continued usefulness in Congress is never an accident. For the making of a real career Congress is useful only to the man who is useful to Congress. Here the great law of compensation is always at work—swift and inexorable.

To him who does not recognize that true progress in life, under any condition, is inseparably associated with self-denial, Congress offers the temptation of quick notoriety at its heavy cost in loss of public respect.

The pitfalls in Congress are many for him who follows the easy quest of notoriety which, when not based upon accomplishment, is worth nothing. He who enters Congress primarily to work for a career is embarked upon a doubtful venture. Work is not an incident of a career, but a career is the incident of real work. This truth is evidenced by the life of our friend.

Mr. MADDEN was a man whose career of enduring public usefulness in these bodies was based upon toil, during a long period in which he remained in comparative obscurity. This was when he was acquainting himself with the actual business of government which he proposed to know as he knew his own business.

When one has courage along with industry to inform himself, no mere eloquence in opposition can detract attention from his utterances or lessen their great influence. When MARTIN B. MADDEN rose in his seat to speak upon any question involving the greater business policies of the American Government he spent no time in decorating fact with rhetoric or digressive oratory, and yet no man in either House commanded to a greater degree the attention of his colleagues or the country at large.

We now remember the cry of the hostile crowd in the past withstood in the public interest not as a political factor affecting political decisions but only as that which demonstrates the possession of courage, strength, and character, devoted to the permanent public benefit, in him who has died.

We now see that after all the highest decoration one can carry to his grave is that of general public respect—that in the long run this comes only to the statesman who, standing for the ultimate public interest at political risk, is willing at times to defy the clamor of uninformed majorities until through facts and reason he wins them to his position.

We now realize that in the quiet of the night and in his committee room, and outside of office hours, the unremitting labor of this devoted public servant finally brings to him an inarticulate judgment shared by all—"Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

He died as he would have died and as we would have had him die—still at work, despite the feebleness of his advanced years and illness, at his desk in the Capitol and in the arms of a comrade in work. He died with the harness of battle upon him.

He died in the fullness of his moral strength and influence, with his mind, as always, upon the never-ending tasks before him and duty to be done. He died in the consciousness that the results of his constructive work are felt in a better government and in a happier life of our people.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for me to suitably express myself on this sad occasion. MARTIN MADDEN was my friend. I loved him deeply. As I stand here to-day I am conscious of a sense of great personal loss. My hand and heart reach out to his bereaved family with a sincere sympathy and understanding because my own grief is so poignant. There is not one of you who has come here to-day to mourn over him and pay tribute to his memory who feels otherwise. His honest, intelligent, and faithful service here commanded your respect. His personality and his great heart won your love.

We all know that a leader has fallen, a truly great man has passed away; a great legislator and statesman; a splendid, outstanding citizen; an able and highly successful business man; a devoted and tender husband and father; a good and intensely loyal friend. This epitomizes the life and record of Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, whose sudden death on April 27 deeply grieved his colleagues and shocked the entire country.

During the morning he had been busily engaged conducting hearings preliminary to the preparation of the last appropriation bill for the session. The committee had taken a short midday recess. Shortly before time for it to reassemble its great chairman, while sitting at his desk, suddenly received his final summons and his noble spirit took flight to the Great Beyond. He died as he would like to have died—at his post of duty, actively engaged in the service of his country, to which he had for so many years devoted his splendid talents.

No brave soldier who ever fell in battle more truly sacrificed himself for his country than did he, for his death was hastened by the herculean labors he performed as chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations, and his close attention and leadership in all the important legislation of the Congress. Only a short while before his death he came from a sick bed to confer with the President and other leaders of his party relative to one of the most important measures pending in Congress.

In the last few years of his life his family and friends often urged him to slow up in his public activities and to devote more attention to the conservation of his health. But that high sense of duty which controlled his every act and which was the guiding star of his whole career impelled him to drive onward at full speed until the very last. The arduous duties performed by him as chairman of the Appropriations Committee are not readily appreciated by the public generally. It is not a spectacular service nor one which is carried to the public on the front pages of the newspapers, but it is a service which demands constant, intelligent, and faithful labor. None save those who were associated with him in Congress or who were charged with the administration of our national affairs can appreciate to the fullest extent the value of his service—a service which entitles him to rank as one of the greatest of the many great men who have presided over the Committee on Appropriations in the years that have passed.

The committee room affords the best opportunity for close study of a colleague and even greater opportunity to know the character and worth of the man who presides over it as chairman. Any selfishness, littleness, or disposition to neglect his duty would be exposed. I have served under MARTIN MADDEN'S leadership for nearly nine years. I have had that close, intimate contact possible only under an association of this kind, and I voice the sentiments of every member of his committee when I say that these characteristics were foreign to his character. My affection and respect for him steadily grew with the years.

His service here has ceased, but as surely as this world of ours is constantly swinging forward into the dawn the soul of MARTIN MADDEN has gone forward into a broader and freer spiritual being, and somehow and somewhere will continue to serve.

He was an ardent Republican. He earnestly believed in the principles of his party, and because he believed in them he never lost an opportunity to fight for them. But at the same time he was broad-minded and tolerant in all of his views, and never allowed partisanship to interfere with his personal friendships or permitted it to influence his position on public questions which did not strictly involve matters of party policy.

He was honest, both intellectually and morally. He despised sham and duplicity. His sense of fairness was evidenced by his attitude in the committee. He insisted at all times that the committee hearings and the reports submitted should fully disclose all the facts and thus give to everyone who wished the fullest opportunity to know all the facts bearing on any and all items in appropriation bills.

He was always kind and considerate. He delighted to do his colleagues and his fellow men a favor and responded readily to every call which did not violate his sense of duty. He had the keen perspective and farseeing vision of a constructive statesman and a sound business man, but he stood like a stone wall against extravagance and wastefulness of public moneys, and it would be impossible to even conservatively estimate the many millions of dollars which were saved to the Treasury through his efforts.

Through his business acumen he amassed considerable wealth and through the medium of his financial power he brightened the lives of many who to-day mourn him as a benefactor.

He practiced in his daily life the religion taught and lived by the Man of Galilee. Just two weeks ago in this Chamber at almost this very hour, in eulogizing a departed friend and colleague, he gave expression to his views on this subject when he said:

> I was taught to believe, and I still believe it, that we will meet again, and what a joy it is to breathe that thought. It is an inspiration to live right and we men who are open to the criticism of the unjust, as we are frequently, we men who give ourselves to the world, so to speak, particularly to our country, without hope of emolument or reward, do so because we are interested not in ourselves, not in our particular neighbor, but in the Nation, in the world and its advancement, in the movement forward of the human race. Most of us do not have to serve here for a living. Thank God we do not, but we choose to serve because we want a broader field in which to render the service we think our Nation needs than we could render in other fields.

As he said of his deceased friend we can truly say of him:

> He served at a great personal sacrifice. He served because he loved his country and because he loved his fellows, and he was willing to make any kind of a sacrifice that his life might not be lived in vain.

Paraphrasing what he said on that occasion we exclaim, Oh, what a man he was! and what a life he lived, and how we can afford to emulate him. It is men of his type who make for the richness of the patriotism, devotion, and unselfishness in men that build up the nations of the world and makes them move forward to better things, greater liberty, greater happiness, and greater prosperity for humanity.

Those of us who worship the Living God, although we can not always understand His ways, are fortified by our unswerving trust in Him and are comforted even in death. Though we lose those nearest and dearest to our hearts we are given the courage to say, "Thy will be done." Fortified and sustained by "unfaltering trust" death is not hideous to one who lived a life like MARTIN MADDEN'S—rather is it beautiful—this step from this world to eternity. Liszt beautifully expressed this thought when he wrote his Preludes, the theme of which is that each event and each period of our lives are but preludes to that vast and beautiful harmony which we call death. MARTIN MADDEN'S life was a series of such preludes.

And now we must say "Farewell"—the saddest word in our language. Good-by, dear friend. We will try to exemplify the courageous spirit manifested throughout your life in bearing the grief at our parting. And I must let these flowers with their petaled lips and perfumed breath speak in beauty and fragrance the sentiments which I am myself unable to utter.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, a mighty tower of strength among us fell when MARTIN B. MADDEN went to his exceeding great reward. It would require a considerable volume to give even an outline of the work accomplished by him during his memorable service in this body, and were all told of his positive deeds and achievements, less than half would be recorded of the real worth of his service, unless a catalogue were made of the things which he, by the great force of his energy and influence, did not permit to happen. Oftentimes these quiet acts of prevention or negation required more courage, more ability, and were far more effective for good than many overt acts loudly proclaimed from the housetops.

Of MARTIN MADDEN'S public services prior to his entering Congress, and even through the earlier years of his service here, others will no doubt speak, and will doubtless refer to them more in detail than I should be able to do. I shall refer, and that very briefly, only to the crowning work of his notable career in the House as chairman of the powerful Committee on Appropriations, and to the use during that time made by him for the public good of the tremendous power and influence that he acquired both before and after he became chairman of that great committee.

The House of Representatives has been most fortunate in having men of rare, preeminent ability to serve as chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations. Going back over the list during my own service here there are to be noted Tawney, Fitzgerald, Sherley, Good, and MADDEN, all giants, and each possessing peculiar fitness and qualifications for the particular task of chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Among these giants stands MARTIN B. MADDEN, the only one known to a majority of the present membership of Congress. It is by no means a reflection upon any one of the other men mentioned to say that MADDEN had a number of extraordinary qualifications vouchsafed to but few men for this very great task. The work that he accomplished between the time he became chairman of that committee and the day of his death stands out as one of the finest monuments that could possibly be erected to any man. Certainly during the last 25 years of our history I have known of no other that excels or equals it.

To MARTIN MADDEN came the task and the opportunity of taking up the work of the Committee on Appropriations about the time the Budget system was adopted, and he rose to that opportunity in a masterly way. It was not an easy task. A mistake made at that time might have been extremely serious. In the working out of the difficult problem involved he made no mistake. Prior to his chairmanship appropriations had been made not only by the Appropriations Committee but by a number of legislative committees, and even the appropriations made by the Committee on Appropriations were carried in a number of different bills based upon no system whatever. Under MADDEN a new policy was adopted of making appropriations in separate bills for the several departments of the Government, and although for convenience several departments in some instances are included in the same bill, in each case all of the appropriations for a department are carried in a single bill. It was a complete revolution in the mechanics of making appropriations, and MARTIN B. MADDEN was the master spirit in making this far-reaching and beneficent reform.

If only the work of MARTIN B. MADDEN as a member or as chairman of a committee, or even on the floor of the House, were taken into account, the story would be most incomplete. His influence in shaping and controlling all legislation during the time of his service here, and especially in preventing unwise and wasteful legislation, was always very great, and while it is not possible to record a tithe of the things accomplished by him along this line, I regard it as one of the things for which he deserves the very greatest honor and admiration of the people of the entire country.

The extent of his helpfulness in the conduct and leadership of the House of Representatives can not be adequately stated, much less can it be overestimated. He was always ready to shoulder his share of the burden and responsibility. He did not duck or dodge an unpleasant duty. He gave of himself unstintingly, and when he fell, as I believe he would have chosen to fall, literally in the harness of battle, he left a startling gap in our ranks. Truly, his place here can not be filled.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is as a friend that I like best to recall my beloved colleague who recently passed out of this earthly life. The public records are replete with the achievements in governmental affairs which proclaim him a statesman; his many years of faithful duty as chairman of the finance committee of the Chicago City Council and of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives proved his wonderful ability to manage huge financial problems. His fearlessness in the cause of right, his moral courage and calm self-possession in meeting opposition, his ability to smile in the event of adverse decision—all of these contributed to the success of his contests in behalf of his party and his country. These and many other worthy attributes are familiar to us all and cause us to admire that side of his character which guided him safely and sanely through many years of public service.

But MARTIN B. MADDEN was more than a successful business man and more than a dependable public servant whose sound judgment and impartial views were sought by party leaders and Presidents. He was, to my mind, first of all a friend, for he became such to me upon our first meeting, a memorable day more than 40 years ago. Our early associations were along business lines, and always with the same feeling of mutual understanding and good fellowship which drew us even more closely together during these later days as colleagues in Congress. The same kindly spirit which manifested itself during our early business and political associations continued through the period of my service in the Chicago City Council, which office I entered the year following Mr. MADDEN'S retirement. He had served in the body for eight years, seven of which he was chairman of the finance committee.

The day that I arrived in Washington to assume my duties as Representative of my congressional district it was his hearty welcome and kindly interest that made me feel at home amid strange surroundings. Many times I have had cause to be grateful for his aid and encouragement.

In the early summer of 1925 Mr. MADDEN and I journeyed together to Germany and from there to England, where we motored for many miles through the beautiful country near Mr. MADDEN'S birthplace. I have the most pleasant memories of this trip, also of that to Biloxi the following year. Mr. MADDEN'S great store of knowledge upon all subjects, his excellent memory, his inexhaustible fund of anecdotes, and his keen sense of humor made a dull day impossible. It was during the latter trip that one day, while engaged in one of our more serious talks, I urged him to take better care of his health. When I suggested that it might be well for him to retire from public life and enjoy a few years of freedom from the arduous duties of his office he replied, "E. W., my one reason for staying on the job is because I believe that I can be of some good to the country which has done so much for me. And, besides, you know I never learned how to play."

To illustrate how thoroughly Mr. MADDEN enjoyed life under any circumstance and how deeply he loved and appreciated his adopted country, I will quote from a letter written to me aboard the George Washington on his homeward journey from Iceland in July, 1924. He says, in part:

> I have had a wonderful trip. Every day has added new knowledge, new vigor, a clearer vision, new happiness. Just think, I have seen the sun set at midnight and rise again within an hour in all the glory of its splendor. I have crossed the Arctic Circle and have visited lands covered with perpetual snow and ice. I have seen these northern people in their homes, and have witnessed their mode of living and their habits of life, and have marveled at their courage and hardihood. I am pleased to have made the trip. It gives me a broader outlook upon life, and new reasons for contentment. It emphasizes, as nothing else could, the advantages we enjoy. It furnishes the evidence which convinces me that we Americans are more fortunate than most other peoples and that our gratitude for the many blessings showered upon us should be unbounded. I am glad to be nearing home. The very thought fills the heart with gladness and I find myself thrilled with a new inspiration to dedicate myself anew to the cause of freedom which America typifies. We live in a land of opportunity, and it should be our pleasure, as it is our duty, by word and deed, to make ourselves worthy of the heritage which God has bestowed upon us.

Truly, MARTIN B. MADDEN, by his loyalty and patriotism, his unselfish devotion to duty, and by the application of high principles to his everyday tasks, made himself worthy of the heritage which he so dearly loved and appreciated.

Twenty-eight years ago a Chicago newspaper, in commenting upon Mr. MADDEN'S success in bringing about closer relations between employer and employee, said of him:

> There is nothing narrow nor small in this man of affairs. In the business world there are but few men of the noble type that cause all to feel confidence both in their integrity and ability. Mr. MADDEN has eminently the qualities of the man who can feel the hearts and ambitions of all classes. He is only a private citizen, trying to do his duty and doing it well, but such men as he grace the legislative halls of our land and make their constituents proud of their election. If such men as MARTIN B. MADDEN could be induced to join the highest political ranks, how much better party politics would become.

This was shortly after Mr. MADDEN had refused to become a candidate for Governor of Illinois in 1900.

In Mr. MADDEN'S passing Illinois lost one of her greatest statesmen, an honest, fearless, and loyal citizen. A strictly party man, he stood firmly for the principles of Republicanism, but his fairness and his willingness to help in the solution of difficult problems regardless of which side of the House presented them won for him a respect and confidence seldom equaled. The entire country feels the loss of a faithful and efficient legislator, but we who knew best miss, more than all, the genial smile and warm handshake of a loyal friend.

In closing I wish to quote from Mr. MADDEN'S memorial address on the life of our beloved colleague, the late James R. Mann:

> After all, what greater accomplishment can a man achieve in life than to leave the story of such a record printed in the pages of the Nation's history? I shall not say good-by, because I believe in a future. We are not to be here long, we will soon pass on, and my hope is that we will be able once again, where strife is unknown, to meet our beloved colleague on the other shore.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, when Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN passed from this earth on the 27th day of April, 1928, he was still in the full vigor of his faculties and his 74 years of life had not stemmed his wonderful energy, his tremendous courage, or his capacity for hard work, for it will be remembered by those who knew him best and who associated with him on Capitol Hill, that he was in the very midst of the congressional work he loved so well, when he was suddenly called by Him above.

Mr. MADDEN was more than a mere legislator or statesman. He was truly a giant in legislative instinct and capacity. He could almost intuitively scent the meaning, the effect, and the cost of legislative proposal as though by magic, and it was because of this fact that his words on the floor of the House carried such weight.

No one ever doubted his honesty of purpose and few dared to challenge the correctness of his statements, even when they were made without apparent study or mature deliberation.

If any man, be he a soldier, a sailor, a foreign ambassador, or a public servant, ever truly gave his life or the best part of it to his Government, Mr. MADDEN certainly did, and nothing gave him more real pleasure than a good parliamentary fight, where he usually carried his way.

It was not unusual for the present occupant of the White House, President Coolidge, or a number of his predecessors, to call upon Mr. MADDEN for advice and confirmation of ideas which affected both millions of people and millions of dollars in the Treasury, and I am certain that the Chief Executive always benefited by a consultation with the great chairman of the important Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MADDEN was frank, fearless, honest, and outspoken. Neither misrepresentation or evasion had any place in his fine character. When he expressed an opinion his judgment was sound, his language was plain, and he never left one in doubt as to his true meaning.

It would not be an exaggeration to say positively that Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN had actually saved for the taxpayers of the Nation a sum which would run into hundreds of millions of dollars, and he did so in an unostentatious manner which immediately designated him as a great "servant of the people."

When our dear friend Martin was taken from us so suddenly in the midst of his work, the Nation lost one of its outstanding men and public servants and the House of Representatives, or, rather, Capitol Hill, lost one of its most outstanding national figures.

It will be a long time before another such man is presented to the Nation.

Illinois and the Nation will long remember MARTIN B. MADDEN for his words and his deeds, and legislators will follow him a thousand years from now.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, our entire Nation shared in the great loss and grief, suffered by the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois, in the passing of the dean of the Illinois delegation in the House of Representatives, the Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN. Irreparable was his loss, also, to the congressional district, the first Illinois, which did itself proud by giving him to the Nation's service for so many years. He was one of the great leaders in the House, a trained legislator, a noted parliamentarian, and a debater of force and clarity of thought and diction. He was a confidential adviser of Presidents and Cabinet chiefs, a wise counsellor in public as well as private affairs, a political chieftain of rare discernment. Withal, he was the truest and stanchest of friends, never failing in his devotion and service to those he loved. Perhaps his most outstanding characteristic was his indomitable courage, moral, intellectual, and even physical. No threat or fear of consequences could deter him from a purpose he had concluded to be necessary and proper. He never minced words in advocating what he conceived to be right and wise in the performance of his duty. This resoluteness of purpose was reflected in his untiring energy and ceaseless industry. He fell on the field of battle, in heroic death for his country, as truly and fully as if he had worn the armor of military or naval rank. His friends will never forget how a single gasp for breath, a last attack of fatal heart weakness, carried his soul to another world—as he himself verily believed—while he was seated in his committee room, during the noon hour, ready to continue the hearings which he had conducted but a few moments before. Thus passed a hero to his last reward.

I well remember the first time I saw MARTIN MADDEN in action at a political meeting. It was at a Republican county convention in Chicago in 1896. He and others had just successfully reorganized the party, not only in Cook County but also in the State of Illinois, following the régime of the opposition party in State and Nation from 1892 to 1896. Alderman MADDEN—for he was then a member and perforce a leader in the City Council of Chicago—was made the presiding officer of the convention. It goes without saying that the business of the convention was conducted with firmness and dispatch. It was before the days of nominations by direct primaries, and delegates to conventions nominated and indorsed candidates. In the inevitable distribution of candidacies, Mr. MADDEN was understood to be the choice for election by the legislature to the United States Senate. Ultimately this part of the program failed, under circumstances which might have embittered a smaller mind, but Mr. MADDEN cheerfully returned to the party ranks and in due course began his service in the other branch of the Congress, where we, his colleagues, and the country have reaped the benefits of his exceptional ability and ripe experience. His committee work was devoted largely to the Post Office Department and to appropriations. His service as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was one of the longest in the history of the House. In fact, it is probably unsurpassed in length in the case of a committee having complete charge of all appropriations, as for many years the jurisdiction of the committee bearing that name was quite limited, many of the present legislative committees having jurisdiction of appropriations for their respective departments of the Government.

Under the present rules of the House and the Budget system generally, the position of chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations is probably the most powerful post in the legislative branch. The Constitution gave the House control of the Nation's purse strings as a protection against exploitation of the people by undue taxation and expenditures. The Committee on Ways and Means, in the first instance, frames the tax laws and thereby limits the revenues available for appropriations, but the distribution of those revenues among the various departments of the Government and for the multitude of purposes authorized by law is primarily in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations, and the chairman of that committee is its executive head and necessarily exercises tremendous influence, particularly in the case of a chairman of such masterful capacity and force as was Mr. MADDEN. And be it said, also, that Mr. MADDEN had the unqualified confidence and deep affection of his associates on the committee and of the membership of the House generally, with the result that he was in fact, as well as in name, the head of this all-important branch of the work of the Congress. His name will live in the annals of the House as one of the greatest chairmen of a truly great committee, and as a great legislator, a great representative of all the people of the Nation, whose highest and best welfare was the sole interest and objective of his long and useful life.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, on the 1st day of May, 1928, I wrote a letter—a letter to Mrs. Martin B. Madden. I take the liberty to present it, now, to you, as follows:

LETTER TO MRS. MADDEN

MAY 1, 1928.

MY DEAR MRS. MADDEN: I do not know where you are and so I address you at Washington feeling sure the letter will reach you.

Up to the present time I have not felt like writing to you because I could not get myself together. In other words, I could not collect myself sufficiently to express myself in a legible way. I had just received the very great shock in the Illinois primary election when there came the additional shock of Mr. MADDEN'S death.

Thirty year ago, in 1896, Mr. MARTIN B. MADDEN, then alderman of Chicago and a campaign orator of note, came to my home town of Jacksonville and spoke at a Republican meeting. I was on the reception committee and was in attendance during his visit. He was absolutely charming. His hair was black—not a white thread in it. His speech was full of figures. James R. Mann was the other speaker and he discussed the money or currency question in a wonderful historical address, but the audience was absolutely captivated by your husband.

In 1897 in Chicago occurred the election as Senator of "Billy" Mason. I was in Springfield on the night when your husband was told that Mr. Mason needed seven more votes to be United States Senator, whereupon he walked across the hall into the headquarters of "Billy" Mason and thereby made Mason Senator.

In the year 1900 he was one of the delegates who voted for me, helping to lead a great stampede of 300 delegates, which stampede nominated me for governor. During that campaign I learned to know him well.

In 1919, when I came down here as Congressman at large, there were plenty of friends to welcome me, but it was Mr. MADDEN who persuaded Mr. Mann to appoint me on a very important committee, the Judiciary Committee. In the same year we went to France together. He and I and Congressman McKinley. He was the orator of our delegation. He made 3 speeches on the transport going over to France; 2 in Luxemberg; 1 at the recreation center of the battery from Springfield, Ill.; 1 in Diekirch in Luxemberg; and twice more on the George Washington coming home. They were all perfect little gems of speeches.

The George Washington carried 9,600 soldier boys, of whom about 600 were in cots—the majority of them I think cases of amputation. At certain hours of the day 100 of these mutilated boys were brought on deck for an hour or two. I found out by accident that Mr. MADDEN was to be found with these boys during every minute that they and their litters were on deck. I asked him what he said to these boys and he said, "When I see a boy with his arm or leg cut off I sit down close to him and I say to him, 'Son, I am in the same fix as you are'; and I try to tell him how he may be useful and that he must never give up. I also tell him about the kind of stocking he should wear on his stump, and, in short, I am trying to help."

Only recently he came to my aid in the matter of an important appropriation for Springfield, Ill. I can never repay him for the things he has done for me.

I realize that no words of mine can diminish your grief, but I wanted to be among the number of those from whom you are hearing in this time of affliction.

Yours very respectfully and affectionately,

RICHARD YATES.

While the foregoing letter was and is not a letter signed by MARTIN MADDEN, but, on the other hand, a letter signed by me, it serves to show Mr. MADDEN'S conception of the golden rule and of his own duty in connection therewith. Whenever I recall to mind that trip across the ocean and back and across France, I think of Martin and the mutilated boys.

I know no better way to enable us to comprehend his idea of the office of Congressman and his aims and aspirations as to himself than to insert here his description of another Member, his lifelong comrade and friend, James R. Mann. Here it is:

Those who have served in this House at any time during the last quarter of a century will keep in their minds as long as they live the Hon. James R. Mann, of Illinois, the author of the white slave act and the proponent of the woman suffrage amendment to the Constitution, the two greatest legislative achievements that have ever gone into law for the female race, to whom he was the greatest friend and for whom he was the greatest leader in all the history of mankind. In all the time he was in this House no other legislation has been so important as to surpass these in actual service to the human race, and they alone would be sufficient to announce to the world that one of its greatest statesmen passed away when this stately column broke.

For almost a generation that great leader stood on this floor in peace and in war and in rumors of war, in toil and strife and defeat and victory, and that brilliant mind and mighty soul was never swept away by success and never succumbed to defeat. His steady figure towered above them all. For years he was the leader of a minority and fought their battles with a zest and a zeal and a skill, with an ability and courage, with a knowledge of every phase of parliamentary contest that stamped him as the greatest master of legislation on this floor who ever sat in the Congress of the United States. No attack ever found him unprepared. No victorious assault ever took the flag of his party away from his mighty hand; and when his party passed into victory and the final laurels for which he hoped did not crown his ambition, he never faltered in his stride for an instant, but accepted his defeat with a smile, as "Mr. Greatheart" only could, and that very night achieved for his party perhaps the greatest tactical and parliamentary victory ever accomplished when he unseated a Democrat and seated a Republican in this House after as desperate a struggle as was ever had on this floor, when, after an all-night contest, as the first rays of the morning sun glistened along the Atlantic, he challenged the Speaker's ruling and succeeded in overruling the decision of Mr. Speaker Clark, almost President of the United States, in a Democratic House, and so seated a Republican by one majority. No man in American history but James R. Mann could have accomplished that, and no feature of his great career more won him the respect and esteem of his colleagues than the greatness of soul he showed when he, after years of leadership, was denied the reward of his ambitions and loyally continued that fight for his party.

In his long career here he never feared to vote as he thought was just, or to take issue with the House if he thought he was right, as we all saw when he voted to seat VICTOR BERGER, of Wisconsin, though only two others joined with him in that vote; but a practically unanimous House conceded he did this because he thought it was right, and no criticism was ever made of an act which might easily have lost him the respect of many of his associates.

In all the years when the Government wealth was often at his disposal, his integrity remained spotless when he might have accumulated millions. He never hesitated to cast a vote that might easily have brought him the condemnation of the people he served. He never hesitated to do his duty, whether his services were rewarded or not.

Every word of the above eulogy or excomium above set forth is applicable absolutely to MARTIN B. MADDEN. He was a true public servant. I have at home a pamphlet entitled "MARTIN B. MADDEN, Public Servant." It shows almost incredible industry and persistence. It reminds one of the verse:

The heights by great men scaled and kept,
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward through the night.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, nothing that we can say can add one whit to the imprint made upon our country through the illustrious life of MARTIN B. MADDEN, other than as we hold that life before us as a symbol of what can be accomplished by a boy of humble beginnings in free America, and by carrying forward through iteration and reiteration the ideals and programs for which he stood.

In harmony with this idea, the friends of Mr. MADDEN want to give voice to some of the thoughts that are in their minds touching the life and character and the public services of this remarkable man.

The intimate story of the man has been told by those who have known him throughout the years. His home, his devotion to his family, his devotion to his friends, all of these things in a broad way are well known. They are applauded.

There is one factor connected with the early struggles of our late colleague that impels me to give it more than passing notice. Mr. MADDEN was a poor boy. We see him struggling for the success that is the goal of every right-thinking boy who looks forward from youth into manhood's years.

Poverty constitutes no bar sinister to attainment in America and it constitutes no bar sinister to success in the ideals that belong to the kingdom where boys rule. Boys love adventure; boys love their fellows regardless of the clothes they wear or the homes from which they come; boys love nerve; they love grit; they love industry.

MARTIN B. MADDEN, through poverty, through hardship, by means of industry, frugality, and honesty, overcame the obstacles of childhood, the privations of youth, and established himself in early manhood as a successful man in business; a man who in small responsibilities, and then with increasing rapidity in responsibilities of tremendous magnitude, could be relied upon.

Mr. MADDEN was a master in the organization of men for the accomplishment of a task. His ability in this regard was accomplished through acquaintanceship in the earliest moment possible with the problem in hand; through ability to analyze men so as to pick the right man for each position; through the faith that he had in his judgment and in his associates after he had picked them; and his thorough loyalty in giving them his earnest support when conclusions had been reached.

Time and again I have seen him when I knew he was in doubt as to a course his advisers had chosen, call up the subject for fresh consideration, giving it the benefit of his trenchant and lucid observations, always intending these observations to be elements for consideration rather than decrees or dictates that were to be made a part of the plan itself. And he stood by those who were detailed to handle a particular job if he believed they had been earnest and had accomplished measurably the task of assembling data upon which their conclusions were formed.

I believe that it is an element of human nature that, generally speaking, people measure up toward that which is expected of them. Every human being who is worth while craves responsibility. He wants to have a part. More than that, if he is trusted he makes good, inspired by the trust that has been placed upon him.

Of his work here much has been told by others. To me there is one factor that probably more than any other is responsible for his success as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and that is the factor through which he organized his work. The Budget system had just been established. The Budget Bureau had just been organized. Under the Budget system it was planned that the executive and legislative branches of government would do close teamwork in the matter of expeditures of government.

The underlying principle in efficiency and economies in government, as Mr. MADDEN believed that principle to be and as I believe it to be, is that those charged with a responsibility shall not be personally interested in the cause for which they speak as in an appropriation that is sought.

In the organization of the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations Congressman MADDEN declared it to be fundamental that no special attorney should be put on a committee to plead his own case. He said the members of every subcommittee should be as free and independent in their actions as are the judge and the jurors in the trial of the issues of a case in court.

He declared that this principle is fundamentally sound for two reasons: He believed it to be sound from the standpoint of the Representative himself, who should not be embarrassed by a constituency that, without understanding all the facts, and with a point of view limited to the immediate needs of ambitions of a district, would constantly be making unreasonable demands upon a Representative if he were upon a committee primarily interested in such a way as to influence congressional action in satisfying those demands. He maintained that the Member himself was not free to give an unbiased judgment upon a demand from such a constituency. He would be the interested juror in the jury box.

It was Mr. MADDEN's soundest philosophy that it was wrong to put a man upon a subcommittee interested in the issues before the committee from the standpoint of the Federal Treasury. Self-interest, the inability of the Member to see all sides of the question—these factors would control the Member's judgment and would modify action of the committee adversely to the interest of the Government. More than that, it was his thought that if through personal interest unreasonable sums were carried in budgets for projects or purposes within the Member's district, the Member benefited in order to show how impartial he was to his fellow Members would need be equally generous toward them in their demands. The immediate result would be the expansion of appropriations all along the line.

If this second course were not followed by the members of the subcommittee, they would be charged with partiality by their colleagues upon the floor. More than that, there would constantly be a suspicion, regardless of whether or not a Member with a personal interest had permitted that personal interest to warp his judgment, that his judgment had been thus warped.

The Congress should have faith in its committees. The committees should be so organized that they will command the faith of the Congress. Members may doubt the judgment or the conclusions of their colleagues, but there ought never to be a time when they may doubt the good faith, the conscious or unconscious action of members of the committee charged with solemn responsibility.

No man in my experience in legislative work has enunciated this principle so markedly as did Mr. MADDEN.

Possibly more than most any other man I ever knew, Mr. MADDEN had a penchant for conclusions that seemed to be reached unhampered by the multitude of processes of reasoning, or assortment and assembling of data that necessarily are the impedimenta of most minds. He saw the end. Usually his conclusions were right. Was it intuition? Was it the unconscious reaction of a mind trained in the school of hard knocks? Whatever it was, the process of mind that permitted Mr. MADDEN to reach with unerring exactness in most instances conclusions in great questions and in small was a characteristic that all men recognized.

As a man Mr. MADDEN was rugged, forceful, intolerant of hypocrisy, intolerant of sham, genuine throughout, a hard fighter, a graceful loser, a man of courage, a man of tenderness, a man who by virtue of his plain rugged elements of character had ingratiated himself into the hearts and good will of those who were privileged to serve with him in carrying forward the serious responsibilities that a trusting Nation asked him to assume.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I know of no way to pay a higher tribute to our departed colleague than by quoting an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 15, 1929. When the House had under consideration the War Department appropriation bill pertaining to matters upon the Panama Canal, I offered an amendment to the bill and made a few remarks in support of it. The amendment was unanimously adopted by the House and Senate and the bill was approved by President Coolidge on March 2, 1929, and that provision is now Public Law No. 1035.

It seems to me eminently appropriate that as the commerce of the nations passes through that great highway for the ages to come, the world should forever know that that great dam was officially named by the American Congress as a tribute to our beloved comrade and friend, the great chairman of our Appropriations Committee.

The record of that action of the House is as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: On page 88, line 17, following the semicolon, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"'That in recognition of the exceptionally distinguished services in Congress for nearly 24 years of MARTIN B. MADDEN, the late chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and in appreciation of his active and efficient interest in the Panama Canal throughout its entire construction and operation, and in recently causing the commencement of the construction of said dam across the Chagres River at or near Alhajuela, the said dam and the lake created thereby and the entire plant and the road leading thereto shall hereafter be known and designated on the public records as the Madden dam, lake, plant, and road.'"

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I realize fully that this amendment is subject to a point of order if anyone saw fit to make it, but I can not believe there is one Member of this entire House who will not gladly join in paying this preeminently just and so richly deserved tribute to our former chairman of this Appropriations Committee. For 30 years the Panama Canal was one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of the life works of MARTIN B. MADDEN. I understand that in 1896 he wrote the plank in the national Republican platform which definitely committed the McKinley administration to the construction of a canal across the Isthmus at either Nicaragua or Panama; and from that day to his death he gave the best and most earnest work possible to the efficient construction and practical operation of that canal. For 30 years he said that "canal should be built, owned, and operated by the United States"; and he gave more skill, attention, and time to it during all that time than any other Member of this House. He had a natural aptitude for engineering and construction work.

He was instinctively a builder and financier and he always took pride in this gigantic work. A very few of the older Members will remember that in the early days of the work he made many trips to the Canal Zone and spent the days going through the swamps and jungle personally examining the conditions and slept on a ship out in the harbor. There is not a Member of Congress alive to-day who made those investigation trips with him. In recent years, as he watched the rapidly growing business and importance of the canal, he clearly foresaw the necessity of increasing the amount of water available for the use of those locks and he commenced investigating the practicability of building a large dam up on the Chagres River to impound the terrific floods of that stream for use of the locks during the dry season. He brought about that engineering survey and investigation and the location of the dam and the authorization by Congress of the construction of the dam. He was the originator and creator of this monumental engineering enterprise for which we, his colleagues on this committee, are to-day appropriating this money. He is entitled to all this and much more credit than I am able to give him in this limited time. No one can ever deny his authorship.

He is the father of this dam. It will be one of the most important dams in the world to the commerce of every nation on earth. It will enormously enhance the value and the volume of business of the Panama Canal. It will furnish sufficient water so that these marvelous locks may operate 24 hours a day and 365 days in every year, as they have got to do; and MARTIN B. MADDEN is the one who conceived and brought about this great plan. To properly appreciate what this service means to our country and to the world, both in business and convenience to the ocean-traveling public and to commerce, both in time of peace and much more in time of war, the Members and the public should study necessity and the dimensions of this dam and the quantity of water it will conserve that is now running to waste. I investigated this matter when I visited the Canal Zone a year ago, and became so profoundly impressed with the great service to humanity of our colleague in this matter that soon after my return I introduced House Joint Resolution No. 250 on March 26, 1928, in the language of the amendment I have just offered. I know the membership of this House would have been more than delighted to have passed that resolution during his lifetime. But we knew he was always opposed to naming anything after a living person and for that reason I did not press the consideration of the resolution. But alas, how soon after that was that objection of his overruled.

My thought is that instead of passing that resolution it would now be more appropriate and fitting for this committee, his committee, to insert this provision in this Army appropriation bill dealing with that canal and that dam. I feel very strongly that this action would be the highest honor that the American Congress could pay to our late honored and beloved chairman. It would be the most suitable monument that could ever be erected to his memory and to his life work. It would be a permanent governmental memorial and tribute to his great service to his country as long as the Isthmus of Panama is inhabited by human beings. It would perpetuate forever his great life work for the success of the Panama Canal. I know our action would be very highly appreciated by the splendid woman who was his life's companion, and his estimable daughter and son-in-law, and by every Member of Congress and his many thousands of friends. The word "Alhajuela" has no meaning or special signification whatever, while there is every reason that this great dam should bear the name of its creator. MARTIN B. MADDEN was an honor to Congress and to our country and a benefactor to the human race. Having served with him nearly 20 years in Congress and 8 years with him on this Appropriations Committee, I know that by the creation of this memorial to our distinguished colleague and departed friend Congress will honor itself and our country, and our act will be a perpetual inspiration to the youth of America as long as the Stars and Stripes float over our Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, as MARTIN B. MADDEN, tall and erect, his striking countenance vivid in its portrayal of intelligence, character, and power, and set off by a crown of plentiful white hair, was an outstanding figure in any company, so was he a landmark in this House and in the governmental history of the Nation. He served his country with fullest fidelity and with rare ability. In time of our Nation's greatest financial stress his great talents, his sturdy independence, his great strength of will served us well, and Americans should not forget MARTIN B. MADDEN and his service as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The World War left every one of the participating powers with staggering burdens of debt. As we entered the war, our public debt was negligible, but the close of the titanic military struggle left us with a public debt of more than $27,000,000,000. The language of billions did not come into use until those war days. Hon. John J. Fitzgerald, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the early days of the war, would not use the term, but always spoke of a "thousand millions." And, as he would term it, our war debt was over twenty-seven thousand million dollars. In the war period taxation had been resorted to more onerous than Americans had ever thought to see in this Republic, but patriotism and the active markets of war made them endurable.

But the military struggle closed and then came throughout the world, in every country, an industrial and economic struggle no less titanic. In America those war-time taxes necessarily continued and a disorganized, nearly paralyzed nation of industry was called upon to pay them. The markets of war suddenly were closed and the markets of peace could open but slowly. Several million men enrolled in our armies, were in a few months turned from employments of war to find their way as best they might back to employments of peace. The financial obligations of the war period must be honored, but could only be met by a rejuvenated industry of peace.

The rejuvenation of the peace-time activities of America was as difficult an economic problem as this Nation will ever face. Continuation of war-time taxes was a brake upon restoration of peace-time prosperity that must be removed as rapidly and as fully as possible. Success in lightening that brake contributed in marked degree to the restoration of normal industrial conditions, and MARTIN B. MADDEN played a great part in that.

In the few years that now have elapsed, the United States has paid all its bills as it went along, has paid off nearly ten thousand million dollars of debt, has favorably refunded much of the balance, and has three times drastically reduced rates of Federal taxation.

Such reductions in Federal taxation have contributed materially to our present industrial prosperity and such reductions in taxation were only possible because of retrenchments in Federal expenditure, the constant application of principles of drastic economy so effective as to be dramatic.

The leader in this program of economy, this lessening of Federal expenditures in order that Federal taxation might be reduced and industry revived, was, in the eyes of the Nation, President Coolidge; and too much can not be said in praise of his determined insistence upon this policy and his executive leadership that committed to the program every administrative unit of the Government. But beside him during all that period was MARTIN B. MADDEN, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, likewise able, determined, and insistent. Through the legislative leadership of MARTIN MADDEN the Congress cordially and constantly supported the economy program. The Budget was the governmental agency that made possible the reduction of Federal expenditures in drastic fashion without injury to the proper administration of the governmental functions.

Without the cordial cooperation, the distinguished talents and the determined efforts of President Calvin Coolidge and Chairman MARTIN B. MADDEN the Budget would have been but a broken reed. No Executive, however able, conscientious, or determined, could have succeeded in that undertaking without the constant support of Congress; and the capable and effective leadership of MARTIN MADDEN as chairman secured that.

MARTIN B. MADDEN played a great part in the affairs of the Nation in his lifetime. As a member of the Republican National Convention in 1900 he wrote the plank that committed us to the building of the Panama Canal, and he never lost his helpful interest in that great undertaking. He was an authority on our Postal System.

He was always an exponent of efficient government and clean politics. At one time a candidate for the United States Senate before the Legislature of Illinois, he rejected peremptorily an offer of compromise that would have assured his election but was in conflict with his sturdy ideas of political honesty, and by his prompt action to discomfit that sort of politics he sent William E. Mason to the Senate.

All the important legislation of the past score of years was impressed by his keen business judgment and his broad vision. But it was as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House in the postwar period that he rendered his greatest service.

When he became chairman the House rules had been changed, reposing in that committee all the appropriating jurisdiction of the House, and the committee enlarged to 35. The Budget plan had become a law and the Budget began to function. The billions of dollars estimated by the Executive to care for the needs of his administration were set forth in the Budget, approved by the President, and by him transmitted to Congress. Here it must meet the scrutiny of the House Committee on Appropriations.

Chairman MADDEN organized his committee as he would a great industrial concern, dividing the responsibilities among his subcommittee chairmen and securing prompt and efficient action on the immense Budget. Every item was examined and discussed and the whole brought in approved form before the House in a few weeks. Year after year the Budget was enacted into law very substantially as he approved it. The first rule insisted upon by him and always maintained was that no bill should in its total exceed the Budget total, but that all possible reductions be made. Every year under his chairmanship the total appropriations made by Congress were millions below the Budget total. It was this legislative support and cooperation that made the Budget system a success, made economy a reality, and tax reductions possible.

The appropriation of money from the Federal Treasury was never a partisan matter with him, never a vehicle for advancement of personal, community, or party interest. The expenditure must be justified on the basis of the results of such expenditure, the real merits of the proposal.

Every member of the committee serving under the chairmanship of MARTIN MADDEN knew that, so long as he stood for the public interest and the common good as against selfish interest or advantage to a few, he would have at his back the powerful influence of MARTIN MADDEN, whose integrity was known of all men and whose voice in this Chamber rang out effectively for good government.

Personally, my loss in his passing has been great. Not given to following blindly after constituted leadership, MARTIN MADDEN had my absolute trust in his integrity, his ability, his vision, his ideals. Service under him was service with him. In strenuous responsibilities, consultation with him was always helpful and reassuring. One's own ideals were bound to be invigorated and one's zeal for the common good inspired by contact with him. His friendship was a rare privilege, which does not end with his passing, but will always pervade my life as a pleasing perfume clings about the vase from which the flowers have long departed.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, and visiting friends, some newspapers carry a column headed "First Impressions." My first impressions of this House were of MARTIN BARNABY MADDEN. They were favorable impressions, because it seemed to me that he represented rather a cross section of this body. He seemed to be an epitome of the sterling worth of it. Keen, alert, with the Nation's business at his finger tips, his whole being radiated the spirit of a careful, thorough, businesslike grasp of public affairs.

We of Illinois had known Mr. MADDEN for two generations. His virile and active participation in our State's affairs were partially responsible for its growth and success. He had participated in its political and business life for so many years that we intuitively linked his name with the name of Illinois. But his greatness of character and business ability had gone beyond the confines of our great State and his renown as a legislative financier reached from Lakes to Gulf and from ocean to ocean.

MARTIN B. MADDEN was the pride of Illinois in a legislative sense, and with him now out of our political life we are conscious of a vacancy that may never be filled.

He held the Nation's purse strings in his capable hands. While it is a pleasure to think of him as our outstanding legislator, I love to contemplate apart from all this glory the lessons that soften to our heart his personal story.

The story is not new. He was a poor boy. His daily toil was in the rock quarries of Illinois. He bore burdens then too great for his years. But his hardships and battles for a good and noble purpose taught him to patiently overcome great difficulties; to overcome apparently insurmountable obstacles and to fight successfully the battles of life against great odds.

Here for a generation he lived amid the scenes that he loved and among his colleagues whom he loved.

Here he fought daily the battles of the people and of his country, somewhat fiercely at times but always fairly.

Here in our midst he died as he had lived among the scenes and work and people he loved. Died here almost in our presence with the harness on fighting to the last, whether winning or losing, always for what he thought was right. And when he met his last great antagonist, death, as we all must do, he lost, still fighting. He did not die in bed as most men do, but standing erect and on his feet, with his back to the wall and with sword unsheathed. He died as and where he would have preferred to die. Here amid the scenes of his triumphs and among his friends.

MARTIN B. MADDEN was one of the most kindly and helpful characters it has ever been my good fortune to encounter.

He made new Members feel at home here. He helped seasoned veterans to solve their problems.

His was a soul too big to bear a grudge.

His was a life filled full of fine and useful accomplishments.

Contemplation of his life and services brings constantly to my mind these words so applicable to him.

Toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing,
Onward through life he goes.
Each morning sees some task begun,
Each evening sees its close;
Something attempted, something done,
To earn a night's repose.

And now, here amidst the scenes of his life's triumphs and of his surrender only to death, I seem to feel his living presence among us, still sturdy, helpful, and kindly; still toiling, still rejoicing, but sorrowing—nevermore.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, under the general privilege accorded to Members of the House, I desire to indicate something of the affection and esteem which I held for our late and greatly distinguished and beloved colleague, Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, of Illinois.

Upon my first election to Congress I was fortunate enough to be placed on the all-important and all-powerful House Appropriations Committee, of which Mr. MADDEN was chairman. Thereupon he was kind enough to place me on the subcommittee—of which he was also chairman—charged with the duty of conducting the hearings upon and formulating the annual appropriation bills for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, and on this subcommittee I have ever since served. These bills, in the total funds carried, are the largest of all the Federal supply measures; and covering, as they do, the needs and requirements of these two great administrative branches of the Government, with their manifold activities, the work devolving upon this particular subcommittee, and especially upon the subcommittee chairman, is of the most exacting and responsible character.

Therefore from the beginning of the Sixty-eighth Congress to the date of his death I had the high honor and privilege to serve on this subcommittee with Mr. MADDEN, and the service was not only greatly educative and broadening in character, but it was also inspirational in the highest degree. His vast knowledge of the details of government and his ability to recall the most intimate features of legislation covering his long and active service in the House, were matters for the constant amazement of his subcommittee associates; while his splendid business sagacity and his unfailing sense of duty toward the Nation and its taxpayers enabled him, not only in our subcommittee, but also as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, constantly to solve the most difficult and trying financial problems with justice to all. As chairman of the committee, ever since the Budget system became effective, in the largest possible way he contributed to the splendid fiscal results secured in the administration of our national affairs. Indeed, the whole Budget system might have been a failure at the outset except for his wise, strong, sure leadership in Congress and his unfailing cooperation with the President and the Bureau of the Budget in the administration of the Budget law.

He always regarded himself as the representative of the American taxpayer, and he lived up to this thought. Every claim for an appropriation had to be fully made out before he would approve it; but when adequately grounded upon disclosed facts and needs, he was ready to accept it. His firm, wise policy in dealing with the subject of governmental expenditure had ever so much to do with the great work of holding to the minimum the cost of Federal Government since the close of the World War. In this work, of course, Congress as a whole, under his leadership, performed its invaluable part.

Between himself and his associates on the great committee of which he was the head, there existed the strongest possible bonds of mutual affection and esteem. The Members had unbounded confidence in his ability, integrity, and unselfish and patriotic purpose. Under his guidance the work of the committee was always free from any touch of partisanism. With him all sections were the Union. When it came to expending the billions of dollars carried in the annual supply measures there was in his mind no thought of North, South, East, or West; and this, I am very happy to say, has been, and is, the spirit of the committee.

His splendid qualities of mind and heart endeared him to all. We who had service with him here will have had that service in vain if we have not been made the better for it. I shall never forget the unfailing kindnesses and courtesies he accorded me. Association with him amounted to a sort of benediction. Each of us esteemed him as a tried and trusted friend. His splendid abilities were tempered and seasoned by an unfailing and kindly humor which lent genial sunshine and warmth to all his words and deeds. He invested all he did with the charm of a rare and most gracious personality. He performed for the Nation a service of the highest and most outstanding character.

Measured by every test he was patriot and statesman. Yet his strength was so tempered by goodness, and his goodness was so tempered by strength, that one was ever at a loss to know whether to admire him most for his strength, or to love him most for his goodness.

Of him, also, in all truth it may be said:

> His life was gentle; and the elements
> So mix'd in him, that nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

We who have survived his departure can perform no finer service for our countrymen than by keeping alive and vivid in their minds and hearts the story of his life and the chronicle of his achievements.

It may not be inappropriate to conclude these remarks with the incorporation, as a part of them, of the resolutions adopted by the House Appropriations Committee upon the occasion of our beloved colleague's death; and which, as chairman of a subcommittee appointed for the purpose, I had the honor to prepare:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED MAY 18, 1928, BY THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TOUCHING THE DEATH OF HON. MARTIN B. MADDEN, CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE

Whereas on the 27th day of April, 1928, at his post of duty in the National Capital, in the full vigor of his faculties, and in the seventy-fourth year of his age, Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, Representative in Congress from the State of Illinois, and chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations since July, 1921, died as he wished to die, and passed into the Great Beyond.

Be it therefore resolved by the committee as follows:

First. That in the death of its greatly beloved and distinguished chairman the committee has suffered an irreparable loss, and each member of it has been deprived of a loyal friend, comrade, and counselor. The sorrow thus sustained by the members of the committee may be softened only by the memory of his splendid deeds and character, and by the indulgence of the honorable pride which is theirs because of their intimate service with him, and under his wise and effective leadership, in the accomplishment of great tasks of usefulness for the Nation. As chairman of the committee ever since there came to it the greatly increased powers and jurisdiction following the enactment of the Budget act of 1921, he gave to the Nation and to its taxpayers a service of immeasurable value.

Second. That because of the important work he so long and so ably performed for them—extending without break or interruption from the Fifty-ninth to the Seventieth Congress—his country and his countrymen have also sustained a great and irreparable loss. His courage and sense of duty, his diligence and tact, his unselfish zeal, his marvelous knowledge and grasp of the fiscal and other affairs of the Nation, his broad experience and wide sympathies, his rugged honesty and sense of justice, and his sturdy patriotism were qualities that made him, throughout a great generation of our American history, an outstanding figure in the conduct of our national affairs. Self-made in the best and fullest sense of the term, and holding, always, the unstinted respect and esteem of his fellow citizens, his career epitomized and exemplified the richest and noblest values of American life and enterprise. Possessed in the highest degree of the "common touch," ripe with years and honors, and universally beloved, he has gone to his great reward; and his splendid life and achievements have become the heritage of the Nation, and the memory of them a vital star in the Nation's firmament.

Third. That his faithful companion and helpmate, and the other members of his family, have suffered a bereavement which only time, faith, and the remembrance of his rare and noble character and of his all-embracing love and devotion for them may alleviate; and the committee, and each member of it, conveys to them the assurance of a profound sympathy and a tender solicitude.

Fourth. That these resolutions be made a part of the records of the committee, and that a copy of them be furnished to the bereaved family.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the story of the life and achievements of MARTIN B. MADDEN reads like a romance.

Born in England, he came with his parents to Chicago when four years of age. This marvelous city became his home, and amidst its teeming activities his sturdy character was moulded. Thrown on his own resources while yet a boy he soon demonstrated marked business ability. Before he had reached his thirtieth year he was recognized as one of the outstanding business men of Chicago. He had accumulated a great fortune at an age when most men are just starting on the road to success.

Mr. MADDEN'S first public service was in the City Council of Chicago, where he served for eight years. During his service in the council he was its dominant member. It was here, as chairman of the finance committee of the council, he first demonstrated that genius for fiscal affairs that was later to give him nation-wide fame as chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. He retired from the city council in 1897 and did not again hold public office until he entered Congress in 1905.

When he entered Congress he withdrew from the control and management of his extensive and varied business affairs and devoted himself wholly to his congressional duties.

For 23 years, almost a quarter of a century, his great abilities and his tremendous energies were exerted exclusively for his country's welfare. He early rose to a position of prominence in the House of Representatives. He maintained this eminence throughout his entire service and grew in power and leadership with every session, and on the day of his death wielded more influence and power in Congress and throughout the country than at any other time in his career.

His success in Congress was not accidental. With his fine natural abilities, his boundless energy, and unflagging industry, ordinary success or failure was not possible. His accurate and seemingly inexhaustible fund of information on matters coming before the House for discussion was amazing. While he specialized in matters relating to the Postal Service, and during the later years of his service to the collection and disbursement of the vast revenues of the Government, he did not confine his attention to these subjects alone. He participated in every important discussion in the House of Representatives for more than 20 years. He was always accorded the respectful attention of his colleagues, and he never failed to impart pertinent and useful information on every subject he discussed. He was listened to because he always had something to say. He never talked to the galleries. He never spoke merely that his position and his views might appear in the RECORD. When he spoke it was to voice convictions based on accurate information obtained from exhaustive and impartial investigation.

His great work as chairman of the important Committee on Appropriations has been fully set forth by his colleagues on that committee. I shall not undertake to enlarge upon what they have said. How ably he discharged the important and exacting duties of that high office is known by all his colleagues and is fully appreciated by the entire country.

He was a great chairman of a great committee, and his conspicuous service as such in the closing years of his active and eventful career insures for him enduring fame and a high place in his country's history.

Mr. Speaker, the friends and associates of MARTIN B. MADDEN like to believe that his earthly career closed in a way and under circumstances he would have desired. He died at the post of duty. Weakened in body by advancing years and excessive labors, he retained to the last minute the full possession of all his faculties.

Those of us who were privileged to observe him on the floor of the House the day he last appeared there can never forget the scene. Amidst the confusion and turmoil of the morning hour over matters on the Speaker's table this marvelous and many-sided man, this legislative veteran, rose in his place and in that penetrating, compelling voice characteristic of him said, "Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order." Confusion subsided and the House proceeded to the legislative program for the day. The tall form of MARTIN B. MADDEN was seen leaving the Hall for the last time. Within 10 minutes the House was stunned by the news that he was dead.

Seated at his desk quietly conversing with his lifelong friend and associate, his colleague in Congress from an adjoining district in the city of Chicago, the Grim Messenger delivered his summons and MARTIN B. MADDEN fell dying into the arms of his friend.

There was peculiar appropriateness in ELLIOTT W. SPROUL'S presence at the scene when death came to MARTIN B. MADDEN.

For a full half century they had been devoted friends. There was much in common between the two. Their lives in many ways paralleled each other. MADDEN born in England, SPROUL born in Nova Scotia, they met in the great city on the Lakes when they were struggling young men just starting in life, each without money and influential friends. These two young men were destined to go far in life. They succeeded in business and they succeeded in politics. They each served in the city council and finally met in the National Congress as colleagues. How fine a thing it was when this friendship, a friendship as pure and devoted as that of Damon and Pythias, was interrupted by the death of one of them, the two should be together and alone.

MARTIN B. MADDEN is gone, but his influence lives on. His remarkable career is an inspiration to every poor boy in America. Coming to America a poor immigrant boy he rose to eminence and wrote his name high on the roster of those who do big things.

Gifted by nature with rare qualities of mind and of heart, he grasped the wonderful opportunities our free institutions afford to young men of ability and character. His threescore and ten years were worthily spent and the world is better by the fact he lived in it.

He lies buried in an humble little country cemetery in the broad prairies of Illinois, the State he loved so well and so conspicuously served. His last resting place is in sight of his magnificent country home, where he enjoyed so many happy years, and in a community where he spent his boyhood days.

He was a man in every sense of the word, able, courageous, industrious, devoted to his family, his friends, and his country. He fought a good fight, he kept the faith, he has run his course. His memory and his good influence will long remain.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I wish to contribute in my humble way to the tribute of esteem and respect that will be paid, and rightfully so, by Members of Congress upon both sides of the aisle, regardless of political faith, to the life and character of our late lamented fellow Member, Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN.

Much comment is made to-day in the Nation against the foreign-born citizen. The late Representative MADDEN was a fine, outstanding example of one who was foreign born but who served this Nation with great credit and marked benefit to all its people.

He was a great factor in the upbuilding and development of the country, both as a private citizen and in his services as a Member of Congress for nearly a quarter of a century. During the last several years he served as chairman of the very important Committee on Appropriations.

His life, like that of many other Americans who have gained renown and whose life work merit consideration, was begun under much hardship and amid humble surroundings. Coming into the world with a good physical make-up, he passed through struggles and hardships to success, honor, and respect not only of his own city of Chicago but of the entire Nation. Early environment of industry, integrity, honesty, and love of home has a great influence on the character of an individual. The life of the late Member reveals all this; it also presents the outstanding characteristics of his life—temperate and religious; a man who believed in a Divine Ruler, whose laws should be obeyed as well as the laws enacted by man.

This training was instilled in our late colleague in his youth by the influence of hard-working, faithful, and loving parents; their teachings endured during his entire life.

As a youth young MADDEN was employed as a water carrier in a stone quarry near Chicago, and he was therefore compelled to secure much of his education through night-school study. Here was a young boy who, as soon as his salary permitted it, paid his parents for his board in order that he might be of assistance to them. This water boy had visions of a future, and while he toiled by day he studied by night, preparing himself to compete for success in his adopted land of opportunity—America.

From water boy he rose to be the directing genius in the great quarry enterprise, serving as its engineer, architect, and finally as superintendent over men for whom he had carried drinking water.

Later Mr. MADDEN entered public life and became active in the affairs of that growing western city, Chicago. He was a member of the city council and became its presiding officer. He also served as chairman of the finance committee for a period of seven years; it was in this important position that he perfected a system of cataloguing the indebtedness of the city, so that every obligation was indexed and systematized. This experience was later on of very material assistance to him when he served as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, in which capacity he served until his death.

It can be truthfully said that the late Representative as chairman of that committee, by clear-cut business methods and by his firmness in standing against unnecessary appropriations and extravagance in Government, saved not millions but the amount would run into the billions of dollars for the American taxpayers. His faithful and efficient service in this respect will never be fully appreciated. It is said of him, by those closely associated with him during the World War, that he was the one man who was always ready to back every move of the Government by sponsoring proper financial legislation which would assist in bringing that war to a successful conclusion.

MARTIN B. MADDEN was a partisan in politics, yet he was most fair in his efforts in behalf of his party. He was active in the legislation in behalf of the building of the Panama Canal, and he largely caused the Republican Party to foster the project. In this enterprise he foresaw great protection to this Nation as well as an outlet for commerce from the countries bordered by the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. His active spirit and foresight attracted the attention of President Roosevelt, and during his administration that President appointed MARTIN B. MADDEN as chairman of the important committee which was to determine and report to Congress whether the Panama Canal was to be constructed as a sea-level canal or as a lock canal. The previous training of Mr. MADDEN fitted him well for the study of this important matter of Government expenditure. His knowledge of engineering was brought into play in his study of this problem. He succeeded in convincing the committee, against the recommendations of the Government engineers, that the feasible thing to do to save time and money in the building of the canal was to construct the lock canal. This report was made to Congress, and after much struggle his ideas were adopted and the canal was constructed as a lock canal at a cost, it is said, of one-half the amount which would have been expended for a sea-level canal. The locks now bear the name of "Madden Locks" by legislative act of the Seventieth Congress; this act was introduced and fostered by Congressman EDWARD TAYLOR of Colorado.

Keen knowledge of his subject and the force of character portrayed in fighting for his ideas made MARTIN B. MADDEN a success in his private and public career. Regardless of a great physical handicap, in the loss of one of his lower limbs during his early life, he carried on as one who had no physical defect.

It is with a feeling of sincere affection and appreciation that I pay my tribute to his memory. In so doing I desire to relate my early experience in Congress and my first contact in legislative matters with the late Representative. At the time I first came to Congress the farmers of New Mexico had suffered the loss of crops from a drought of some two years; added to this situation was the deflation at the close of the war which caused the Federal reserve banks to call the livestock loans of the stockmen of the State. This produced a condition which forced the stockmen to sell their livestock at prevailing market prices, which sometimes were but a trifle above freight charges. The result was that the livestock men were not able to meet their obligations, and more than 50 per cent of all banks in the State were closed. The farmers were compelled to ask the Government for a seed loan in order that they might cultivate their land and produce a food crop. The appeal of the New Mexico farmers caused the introduction of a bill in Congress to loan to the farmers of the State $1,000,000 for seed purposes, the loan to be repaid from the crop. Hearings were held; the bill passed the Senate and came to the House for consideration. In order that the bill might be considered on the floor of the House it was necessary to obtain time from the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. This was my first experience in Congress. I applied to the majority leader, who referred me to Chairman MADDEN. The majority leader did not give me much encouragement, as he said that the committee was anxious to dispose of the important appropriation bill; however, he suggested that I take up the matter with Chairman MADDEN.

I immediately proceeded to the office of the chairman and asked him for an interview. Unable to see me that day, he told me to call at 11 a. m. the day following. At the appointed hour I called and placed before him my request for an hour's time on the floor for the consideration of the bill granting a loan of a million dollars to the farmers of New Mexico for seed purposes. Mr. MADDEN immediately replied that he was opposed to this form of legislation; he believed that the matter should be handled directly by the State. I informed him that owing to the deflation and bank failures the State was in no financial position to meet this problem. I outlined the matter to him fully, and his final reply was: "In view of the fact that this Congress has seen fit in the last two days to pass legislation granting millions of dollars for the relief of the citizens of Germany, it would appear to me that Congress can afford to lend a million to your farmers in New Mexico. I will grant you the time to present your bill."

This concession was a great relief to me; I had been under great strain for two months trying to get this bill on the floor; telegrams and letters kept pouring in urging that I pass the legislation. This was my first introduction to and contact with Representative MADDEN. The legislation was presented at the time allowed by him and the bill was passed, thus giving the relief sought by the farmers of New Mexico.

From that time on, upon many occasions, when I had legislation he would inquire as to the bills, my explanations always seemed to satisfy him. Our first meeting seemed to have given him an understanding that I was not asking anything unfair.

The six years I served in Congress gave me a clear insight into the character and very valuable services of MARTIN B. MADDEN. He scrutinized legislation carefully, aiming always to safeguard and protect the rights of the people. I also noted the great confidence the Members of the House had in his judgment and the high esteem with which they regarded him.

In my opinion no Member of Congress has ever rendered better or truer service in legislation than did our late beloved colleague, MARTIN B. MADDEN. It can be said that he cut short his own life in his devotion to faithful service to his Nation. The life and success of our late friend and fellow Member should be an inspiration to every American youth as to what may be accomplished by clean morals, industrious living, and honesty of purpose.

His was an honorable and successful career. In the words of the Bible—

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the councils of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. But his delight is the law of the Lord and in His law doth he meditate day and night.

MARTIN B. MADDEN obeyed God's law, and observed, obeyed, and respected the laws of his country.

THADDEUS C. SWEET

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, THADDEUS C. SWEET was born in the village of Phoenix November 16, 1872. He was therefore only 55 years old at the time of his tragic death. He was of Revolutionary stock, his great grandfather being on the staff of General Washington in the Revolutionary War. His people were in modest circumstances, but gave him a high-school education. He then entered the business world, where his rise was rapid. The remarkably sweet and happy disposition with which he was blessed, combined with great power of application and a real genius for detail, enabled him to forge steadily to the front. He entered the paper-manufacturing business, in which field he became one of the leaders. He was the type of man who has made America industrially and has given to business dignity and ethical standing. His relations to his employees were close, intimate, and sympathetic. His employees' problems were his problems and his service in their behalf was available at any time of the day or night. His success in business was striking and is an example of the rise from modest circumstances to a position of comparative wealth which typifies the growth of our Nation.

In the days of Greece and Rome fame and reputation came to those who served the state best. This is likewise characteristic of our Republic. The memory of THADDEUS C. SWEET will be kept alive and immortalized by his brilliant services to the State and Nation. He entered the field of politics actively in the year 1909, when he made his first canvass for member of assembly. At that time Charles E. Hughes was Governor of the State of New York. Governor Hughes advocated certain basic reforms in the conduct of the Commonwealth. One of these reforms was the establishment of the direct primary, wherein the people in an orderly way might express their preference for their public officers. THADDEUS C. SWEET was what I might term a "practical idealist." In addition, he had an abiding faith in the sound judgment and fairness of the American people. He believed with Governor Hughes that many of the abuses which were incident to our Government would be wiped out by vesting the power to name candidates for office in the people rather than in a small group of hand-picked, boss-controlled delegates. He entered the assembly and stood shoulder to shoulder with Governor Hughes in the enactment of this and other great reforms.

He served as a member of assembly from 1909 to 1920. In 1914 he was elected speaker of that body. His career in the assembly was marked by an unflinching devotion to legislation that stood for morality and law enforcement. His administration of the great office of speaker was as spotless as a star. Wielding the power of his office for six years, he drove the "money changers out of the temple." During his administration legislation was no longer bought and sold. Unflinching on any public proposition, where he believed he was right, he stood resolutely by his guns. During this sometimes stormy service as speaker some of the time with an adverse governor and senate, he made no personal enemies. His political opponents were wont to pay him this tribute, "THAD SWEET is a square fighter, and his word when given is never broken."

He will be best remembered by his part in the socialist ouster in 1919. This little group in the assembly, which attempted to block war legislation, had made their allegiance with the Soviet of Moscow. Speaker SWEET took the position that their oath of office was a mockery; that they could not properly be part of any constitutional popular assembly. Under his leadership and through his driving power and insistence these men were ejected from the assembly. Speaker SWEET was warned that the resident internationals of this particular group and the intelligentsia, so called, would dim his rapidly ascending political star. Men high in the council of his party, in the State and Nation, urged him to desist from this course. His intimate friends, hopeful of his further rise, counseled against this ouster, but he was adamant. Fully mindful of its effect on his own political future he considered only his duty to the State and to the Republic. I have said that this group of antisocial legislators were expelled. They were sent back to their dingy halls where the red flag was waving and the bloody deeds of the Russian Soviet glorified.

I have no hesitation in saying that this act, the consequences of which Speaker SWEET well knew, prevented him from being nominated and elected Governor of New York in the year 1920. I know personally he never had any regrets about the loss of the governorship. We all know that since that time the Socialist Party has waned in the congested sections of New York City. We know that no Socialist has been elected to the New York State Assembly since 1920. This was a great service to the State and to the Nation, which will cause his memory to live long in the hearts of thinking Americans.

The legislation which went on the books in the years when THADDEUS C. SWEET was speaker of the assembly was forward looking, sane, and progressive. Venality was banished from the legislative hall and the labors of our revered dead were thoroughly constructive.

He retired from the assembly in 1920, pursuant to an ardent desire to return to his gentle wife and loving family and to his business affairs. But the public could not let him rest. Upon the death of Congressman Mott there was a demand from all over the congressional district that Speaker SWEET go to Congress. He did not wish to go. He wished to enjoy the surroundings and serenity of home life, to care for his greatly increased business and incidentally to play in the great outdoors. He was an ardent sportsman and loved the quiet of the woods and streams. But the public was not to be denied and he was again drafted into the service.

His rise in Congress was phenomenal. In this body, where length of service is controlling, his wonderful personality caused him again to forge rapidly to the front. At his death, after only five years' service in Congress, he was a member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He had come to be much loved by his associates.

One of his most outstanding characteristics was his devotion to duty. Coupled with this was modesty and personal charm. Another of his assets was willingness to serve. No public man of our day served more zealously or more willingly for his constituents. He threw into the scale all his vitality in endeavoring to serve them in connection with their expressed wish. The humblest constituent of whatever party found Congressman SWEET ever ready to serve him. There was no limit to his zeal or to his energies when something was at stake for one of his constituents.

I have spoken of his attitude toward duty. Congressman SWEET died on duty. Like a soldier on the firing line, he went to his death endeavoring to reach Oswego, N. Y., to participate in certain civic ceremonies there. Delayed by other engagements, the only way he could reach Oswego in time was by airplane. Influenced by his ever-youthful spirit and his unwillingness to disappoint his Oswego constituents, he undertook the journey by air, which resulted in his tragic end.

The passing of this citizen amounts to a positive calamity.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, the death of THADDEUS C. SWEET, of Phoenix, N. Y., meant a triple loss to me—the loss of a warm personal friend, the loss of a member of the New York delegation in Congress, who was devoted to the interests of his State and his party, and the loss of a man who in a comparatively short time in Congress was already rendering conspicuous service to his country.

I served with TAD SWEET in the New York Legislature for five years. After I left the legislature to come to Congress, he became speaker of the New York Assembly, and the fast friends he made there, as well as the ripened political experience he gained in this position, fitted him for the leadership he rapidly attained in the House of Representatives. Throughout his 19 years in the public service he made unending friendships. His affable and happy manner, his courage, his vigor, and forthrightness made of him a true friend and a valuable political ally.

In only his second term in Congress Congressman SWEET was appointed a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, an unusual distinction for a new Member of Congress. His sudden and shocking death in an airplane accident as he was rushing on a friendly mission to his constituents occurred just a few days before he had planned to go with a group of agricultural leaders to confer with President Coolidge on the best method of raising the tariff duties on agricultural products as a means of increasing the prosperity of American farmers.

Were he with us to-day he would doubtless be an important factor in solving the great problem which confronts us in the special session of Congress beginning next month. As the representative of an agricultural district, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, as a business man of notable experience and success, he has devoted much study to the question of tariff protection for the products of the farm as well as the factory. He would have made a valuable contribution to the tariff readjustment now being planned.

A self-made man in business as well as in politics, Congressman SWEET had risen in business from a clerk in a clothing store to president of a paper manufacturing company which he and his brother organized in his early manhood; and in politics from the ranks of those who serve their country when they cast their ballots to one who, at the time of his tragic death, was being urged to become a candidate for Governor of the State of New York.

He never gained political influence at the loss of personal friends. He rose not at the expense of others but by the force of his personality and ability. The men who worked for him, the men who worked with him, the men for whom he worked, loved him.

It is now just 10 months since an inexplicable accident took from the Halls of Congress and from a vast and ever-widening circle of friends the popular and influential figure of THADDEUS C. SWEET. We still feel keenly the lack of his cheerful greetings in the corridors and his sound counsel on legislative matters. We shall not soon accustom ourselves to our loss.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, THAD SWEET and I were personal friends for more than 30 years. Back in the late nineties I was traveling salesman for the Racquette River Paper Co. and sold ground wood pulp to SWEET and his brother, who ran a small tissue-paper mill at Phoenix, N. Y. This casual business acquaintance soon ripened into a warm personal friendship which lasted until his untimely and tragic death.

For many years he had been a member of a hunting and fishing club made up largely of men from Potsdam, my home town, and was a familiar figure on our streets as he came from and went to the Granshue Preserve. He was as well liked and as popular there as he was in his home town. Everyone liked THAD SWEET, for he was a genial, whole-souled, manly man, the kind of a man that made friends everywhere he went. He loved life and the things that went with it, and always did his part to make everyone around him enjoy that same happiness that was so characteristic of his everyday life.

He was a man of robust health, rugged and strong. No task was too hard, and the word "failure" was not in his vocabulary. He was a natural leader of men, and it did not take the House of Representatives long to discover the kind of a man he was or to recognize his unusual ability. No man of equal term of service has more impressed himself on Congress than did THAD SWEET, and no man has left a greater number of friends to mourn his tragic death.

When he came to Congress he was no novice in legislative work, for his long service in the New York Assembly had well fitted him for the work in the House of Representatives. Had his life been spared, he would have filled as important a place in Washington as he had previously filled in our State capitol at Albany. There he held the important position of speaker of the assembly for seven terms and rendered able and distinguished public service.

He was frank, open, honest, and above in all things. He was one of the few men in public life that had the courage of his convictions. You could always find out where he stood on any public question, and you did not need to go around the next day to see if he had changed his mind.

He had the health, vigor, ability, and courage to make him a most valuable public servant. His sudden passing was not only a loss to his family and friends but also to the American Congress. We need such men as THAD SWEET in public life and can ill afford to lose them.

I know I express the feelings of every Member of the Seventieth Congress when I say we deeply mourn the untimely death of a trusted friend and valuable Member of the House of Representatives. Such was THADDEUS SWEET.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, putting one's thoughts into language that will properly express one's feelings toward departed friends is indeed a hard task. To pay fitting tribute to a statesman like THADDEUS SWEET is doubly difficult because his untimely and tragic death is not only a loss to his family and numerous friends, but is a loss to the Empire State and the Nation as a whole.

I knew THAD SWEET; in fact, I sat next to him in the legislature of our State at Albany. I knew him to be a man possessed with the highest and noblest principles; always quiet, modest, sincere, evenly balanced, and at all times kind and friendly to those who came in contact with him.

He served his State as speaker of the assembly from 1914 to 1920, with a high purpose and ability, and with great credit to himself, his family, and his State. As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means he had the respect and love of the membership of the House, who at all times held him in the highest esteem.

His untimely death, unexpected as it was, shocked and grieved me. I always found him kindly and affable, sincere and sympathetic, considerate and courteous, and I am more than glad to have the opportunity of paying tribute to his memory.

This House was honored and dignified by his presence. The great State of New York is better because of the great service he rendered to it and the community in which he lived profited in him as its Representative.

During my melancholy privilege of attending his funeral I saw at first hand an abundance of evidence in testimony of the honor and reverence of his immediate fellow citizens. It was deeply impressed upon me that though these mourners must turn away from the grave marking his eternal resting place there would be no turning away from his memory, enshrined forever in the hearts and minds of those who loved and knew him best.

The individuals who stand out in prominence the world over are the ones whose honesty and simplicity first attract you and whose gigantic ability to perform their tasks afterwards impress you.

It is well that we in life should in the midst of life's activities pause to sacredly observe an occasion like this and to drop a flower and a tear in the memory of our departed friend. In the exercise of this high but sad duty we not only confer some measure of honor upon him who has gone to the great beyond, and from whence no traveler returns to greet us again on this material earth, but we at the same time cultivate our own conceptions and understanding regarding the highest of things. "That is what we call life here and life hereafter."

I personally deeply mourn the passing of THADDEUS SWEET; he typified the highest ideals and the very noblest and best American manhood and statesmanship. How wonderful and noble it would be if we would all keep green the sainted memories of our loved ones, their faults forgotten, their virtues enshrined in our hearts forever.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the names of the illustrious dead in whose honor this House has assembled in a beautiful and solemn ceremony will be dealt with in the pages of this RECORD by friends and colleagues, who through years of fellowship and close association are qualified to do justice to their memory. Availing myself of the invitation so graciously extended to us by our distinguished Committee on Memorials, it is my purpose to lay my tribute at the shrine of THADDEUS C. SWEET, formerly a Representative from the State of New York, which it is my honor and privilege to represent in part in this House.

It was my good fortune to know Mr. SWEET some years preceding his advent to the larger field of membership in this body. Our acquaintance goes back, sir, to the days when we were together associated in the Legislature of New York. There I early recognized his sterling qualities and great ability and was enabled to follow carefully and approvingly the meticulous care and thoroughness with which he handled the many important and conflicting problems that came before us for solution. For four brief and happy, as well as to me very fruitful, years, we did our part together, and I can say of my deceased friend that the lines of demarcation were never drawn on a political basis when the interests of our State were involved. All of these years he was the speaker of our branch of the legislature and I can cheerfully say that he was the embodiment of the fair and square presiding officer under whom every member received his full measure of recognition and courteous consideration. As speaker he did me the great honor in 1916 to add my name to the list of those who represented the State of New York at the Panama-Pacific exhibition held in the city of San Francisco. He was very active in the business life of his community, and finally found it necessary to separate himself from his public work and direct his great energy to his private and rapidly increasing business enterprises. It was the avowed determination of our friend to leave behind him the cares and responsibilities of public service and take up instead the various personal commercial interests which his unusual business genius had fostered and developed. But, alas, in this instance the man proposed, but the people decided, and his resolution was of short-lived duration. So we find him back as the Representative of his people, but in a higher and a larger field in the Congress of the United States. The leaders of his party came early to realize his exceptional ability, and he attained a place on the great Committee on Ways and Means in an incredibly short period after his election. His worth and usefulness in his work is gladly certified by his committee colleagues without regard to party, and his affability, kindness, and courtesy endeared him to all.

Mr. Speaker, the district he served so conspicuously in this House needs no encomium from me as to the rare discernment they displayed in his selection. They selected a man who never forgot to serve them faithfully and well, and he fulfilled his duty as God gave him the power and the inspiration so to do. We all sympathize with his bereaved family, but our words can not assuage their sorrow. Still in this solemn hour devoted to a contemplation of his character and accomplishment it will be comforting to those who loved him in his life to recall that though his distinguished career is closed he has left behind him the heritage of a great name respected and honored throughout the Nation.

To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, this day we meet in this historic Hall to commemorate the memory of 10 of our beloved colleagues who, in the period from July, 1927, to December, 1928, have been called upon to pay the final price to which flesh is heir.

Death has exacted a heavy toll, and thus through this undeniable messenger's summons 10 friendly and revered associates are missing from this meeting. Nevertheless, because of our sublime faith in Almighty God and our belief in His infinite wisdom, and bowing to this mandate with resignation and respectful deference, we know that these spirits of the illustrious dead are looking down upon us in this hour while we assemble to pay tribute to their worth and to their memory.

Many of my colleagues will seize this opportunity to extol the virtues of our deceased friends who because of years of close and intimate association have the right and the privilege to speak.

The great State of New York, which I have the honor to represent in part in this House, has the name of one of its cherished sons in the list of those in whose honor these very beautiful services are being held to-day.

THADDEUS C. SWEET, whose tragic end on May 1, 1928, shocked our membership, came among us in the Sixty-eighth Congress. None would imagine that this quiet, inoffensive gentleman was the embodiment of all that statesmanship represents—as a result of unexampled service to his great Commonwealth.

His ancestry was of sterling American stock, for his great-grandfather was on the staff of George Washington in the struggling days of the War of the Revolution.

After a common-school education he entered the high school at Phoenix, N. Y., in the town that gave him birth and which during his short career in the House he so conspicuously represented. His was no bed of roses; he had to make his way in the college of "hard knocks," of which some writer once said the colors are "black and blue." Slowly but surely he climbed the ladder of achievement until in 1895 we find him in the manufacturing business, finally becoming the president of the company and chairman of the board of directors of a great trust company.

In 1909 he was sent to the New York Assembly, in which during 1914 to 1920 he officiated as the speaker. All of his colleagues who served with him during those years, regardless of political affiliation, are unanimous in his praise as a fair, square, and kindly presiding officer.

On occasions like this, Mr. Speaker, we can but think of the serious problems of life. We wonder whence we came and whither we are going; what it is all about, and whether death is the end, or whether the tomb is but a gateway to an eternity of opportunity.

It can not be that our very short existence upon earth is the end. There is that within us which speaks unerringly of another life, broader and higher and better than this. It can not be that the years of toil and strife and affection and preparation of a life well lived end at the grave. Another life beyond the mystery we call "death" is prophesied with certainty by that unceasing and unsatisfied hunger in the human heart for something better than we are. Life is not broken, but continuous and unending. The deep, unfathomable mystery of being remains unsolved. The beginning of life we know not, yet we know that we are, and we know that we shall continue to be, united beyond the grave with those loved ones who have gone on before.

We think sometimes that perhaps death is the end of the feverish journey of life, but that is because our poor, weak human vision is so limited and so shortsighted.

Too often our good deeds weaken and die in the memory of men, but every human being soweth seeds which grow and multiply. In the crush of human emotions not all the good will fructify and neither will all the evil flourish, but like a great oak whose branches are strengthened as they increase their gracious shadows, so deeds of kindness strengthen the human heart. So grew the generous nature of this man, honored by the populace, until often the distress of others became his very own, and by the touch of his helping hand their heavy cares were rolled aside.

I do not know what creed he professed; I know not what church cast its sanctified mantle about him, neither shall the records of justice take note of these, for it is written in the roll of heaven that he was charitable, he was generous, he was kind.

Mr. Speaker, the herald of death oft gives no day of grace, as in the case of him of whom I speak, and when from the shadow came the summons to attend the last roll call in the house of life it found our friend yielding willing tribute to friendship—it found him giving aid to others.

Fate silently beckoning, held aside the veil and he entered, to return no more; but to-day, on the face of the cliffs of time, we will chisel his name and beneath it subscribe the humble tribute: He gave aid and comfort to his fellow men.

So let us not so much mourn that he is dead, but rather let us rejoice that he has lived. Let us not think so much of his untimely taking off, but rather of the fullness of his life. Poets for ages have sung of the sadness of death when it comes to a man of full life and vigor, to one still ready and willing to do a man's part in the world of men, yet the Greeks personified death by a beautiful boy crowned with immortal youth, and somehow that ideal seems fitting. For the deeds of man, the lesson of his life, and the good example he gave will live forever, and their rejuvenation from one generation to the other may well be exemplified by youth. Stricken in life's prime, in the fullness of a splendid usefulness, TAD SWEET left to his family, to the people of his district, and to us a monument more enduring than marble and a heritage more precious than gold.

Peace and death's beauty to his heart to-day,
Who is not dead, but only gone away
To sleep a little, as a child who goes,
When twilight folds the petal of the rose.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, active and in demand as TAD SWEET always was he never at any time was brusque or curt with his fellow man. Officially he had tremendous responsibilities, but they did not weigh on him so heavily that he forgot the thoughtful deeds that public men are apt to overlook.

I knew him well in both Albany and Washington. He was an alert legislator and a man of wise and ready decision. As speaker of the Assembly of the State of New York he never let partisanship blind him to the fair play that characterizes the big men in the political world.

The reputation for high-mindedness he won at Albany he carried with him to Washington, where it was recognized nationally.

His untimely end was not only a terrible catastrophe to those who loved him but it cost the Nation a vivid personality whose contribution to our welfare in the short time of his congressional service was most substantial.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I desire to pay my tribute to the memory of our departed friend, THADDEUS C. SWEET.

On the first Wednesday in January, 1910, he and I walked up the hill to the State capitol at Albany. Both of us were fledgling members of the legislature. He from the northern part of our great State, and I from our great city. Although of different political faiths, a friendship was formed between us that lasted through all the years until his untimely and sad death. We saw much of each other, and I was always happy to have him visit me.

We worked together at Albany for 11 years, 6 of which our friend was speaker of the assembly of the State. Again it was our good fortune to meet and work in the House of Representatives, both of us coming here in the Sixty-eighth Congress.

His was a splendid and pleasing personality. He early developed a keen insight into legislative work and practice. He was devoted to the interests of his State and country. His last speech on the floor of the House was in support of a bill to repay his native State funds advanced to the Government during the War of 1812. He always spoke his convictions and supported them by his vote. He was always inspired by the highest motives in his public work, and he considered the welfare of the Nation alone when charting his course.

He was a man of sterling courage and a splendid friend. He was ever willing to allow for the faults and omissions of humankind; and his temperament was kind and gentle.

I shall ever treasure my friendship with him, and I know that the knowledge of it will always be an inspiration and help to me in the trials and vicissitudes of life.

He completed the work allotted to him here; the result—a beautiful pattern, full and well rounded out, a splendid example to us all—and, although he is gone from us, I know that he will ever treasure in fond remembrance our knowledge of his splendid life and deeds.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, this memorial meeting called to express the great sorrow of the House of Representatives on the passing of its Members, presents an opportunity to the survivors of such Members to express their feelings of regret on the passing of their friends and the untimely loss of membership of this House.

THADDEUS C. SWEET, whose life came to an untimely end when he was fatally injured in an airplane accident several months ago, was one of the outstanding members of his party. His character was charming. The friendships he made among Members of this House were many and varied.

There is hardly a Member of this House who does not recall SWEET's genial personality, his unfailing courtesy, his great tact, and his readiness to serve whenever called upon to do so.

He was always in the forefront of any progressive action which this House would take in any matter involving the welfare of the public.

In my own State he served with distinction as a member of the assembly and for six years as speaker of the assembly.

I had the extreme pleasure of being sworn in as a member of the Assembly of the State of New York at the time that THADDEUS C. SWEET was speaker, and it was under him that I served as an assemblyman for a number of years.

The particular manner in which laws are enacted in the State of New York makes the speaker of the assembly the decisive factor in the passage of any law which may engage the attention of the legislature of this State. It is the speaker who directs the appointments of members of all committees, and it is the speaker who is head of the committee on rules and takes charge of all legislation in the Assembly of the State of New York for 10 days before the end of the session. As such chairman of the committee on rules, the speaker may force the passage of any bill which he deems appropriate and prevent the passage of any legislation which he deems inopportune. Speaker SWEET exercised the great powers of his office for the public benefit and so as to give the public all such legislative measures as would result in public good. It was the speaker's thoroughgoing knowledge of the needs of the State and his intimate acquaintance with the business of the State which resulted in some of the most progressive legislation which the State of New York could place on its statute books during the time of his incumbency of that office.

When Mr. SWEET was elected to Congress it became again my pleasant duty to assist him in his new legislative duties, although his experience in the New York State Legislature was more than sufficient to make him into a valuable Member of this House and result in his perfect mastery of the parliamentary routine which governs our labors.

My colleagues and I were, therefore, very much grieved and full of sorrow when Mr. SWEET passed away. We were looking forward to many years of continued cooperation in the work of Congress. While not of Mr. SWEET's political party, I always found a willing listener in Mr. SWEET when advocating or urging legislation in the interest of the common man, woman, or child of America. Mr. SWEET gave his life to the public welfare, and his love of the masses made him a conspicuous figure in all progressive legislation which engaged our attention from time to time.

I hoped and expected that I would have the privilege of having Mr. SWEET's support on the measures of public welfare which I had the good fortune to introduce in Congress from time to time. The Almighty, however, ruled otherwise.

We may, therefore, suspend a moment in our deliberations and let us shed a tear on his untimely death and express our regrets to his bereaved family.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, THADDEUS C. SWEET came to Congress after a distinguished career as Speaker of the Assembly of New York State. He was a successful business man, an untiring worker, and one who enjoyed doing something for somebody else more than he did for himself, and as a result the demands upon him for the services which a Congressman can render to his constituency and to his friends were larger than those upon the most of us. This was especially true with reference to the cases of disabled veterans of the World War. He took an especial interest in them and in looking after them, and I doubt if any other Member of the House was able to accomplish more for them than was Mr. SWEET. He served on the World War Veterans' Committee of this House and on the Pension Committee. The last two years of his service and at the time of his death he was a member of the Ways and Means Committee, where his business experience combined with his long legislative experience made him a very valuable member.

He was noted for his cheerful disposition and his extreme kindness and tact in handling people. These qualities endeared him to all with whom he came in contact and made him a most useful and valuable citizen. He was always fair—even charitable in his judgment of others. The country has lost a fine, upstanding citizen—one who always stood for the best interests of America. Personally, I have lost one who was my closest friend in the House—one whom I loved as a brother and respected to the utmost.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, one of the delights in public service and the cause of better government is the intimate contacts we make with representative men of action and accomplishment from all sections of the United States.

When TAD SWEET arrived here it did not take the Members of Congress long to know—they are shrewd judges of human nature—that a real man was in Congress. His background of experience in the New York Legislature, his general reputation as a leader, were known to many, and when they actually came to meet him you never heard a comment that was not favorable.

Tad's office became a rendezvous for a multitude of friends made in the New York Legislature as it became the mecca for many of us who wanted to know better the man whose personality we found interesting. He was a great captain of details, he knew his district, its industries, and a multitude that called him "Tad." He loved his district's people and every part of it. Many a time I have heard him remark in a longing way his desire for home and the old friends, as much as he esteemed the new ones.

His unselfish loyalty to friends was not questioned and his willingness to work for them was always in evidence. The genuine good cheer of his greeting was an inspiration, and his ability to get things done made him a model legislator. I prized his friendship and venerate his memory.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, memorializing a colleague from New York in the House of Representatives just a few years ago, THADDEUS C. SWEET said:

> In every land, honor and renown are accorded to every citizen who fills his life with service to others in any walk of life, public or private, civil or martial.

In that eulogy of a comrade, THADDEUS SWEET stated his own philosophy of life—a philosophy that directed his own dynamic existence. According to the standard by which he measured a friend, he, himself, lived. By it he gained, without directly seeking it, an honor and renown that will survive him so long as memory lasts.

Service to others, regardless of their station, was an essential part of THADDEUS SWEET'S being. To him it was an ambition. It was reflected in a personality that caught the admiration of acquaintances, and captured the hearts of those privileged to be his friends.

It was as a friend—an intimate friend—that I knew him. I met him when I began my service in the House of Representatives, just as I met other Members of this body. But fortune made him my residence neighbor, too, and during my apprenticeship he took a personal interest that ripened into an enduring friendship. Our official relations were made doubly pleasant by a social companionship that was more than agreeable. Small wonder, then, that his untimely and tragic end shocked and grieved me, and left me with a sense of personal loss in his passing.

It has been aptly said that we live in deeds, not years, and thus we may appraise THADDEUS SWEET. His span of life in years was short. In deeds, it was rich. Without deeds—deeds of service—there would be no friendship. His life was richly crowned by both.

> With a rustle of the forest and a fading of the light,
> And the silent calls and numerous of the swiftly falling night,
> And the hum of unseen voices as the wild things take their flight,
> The evening comes.

The evening came into the life of THAD SWEET, and with it the darkness. But through it will ever shine in my memory the unfailing light of his friendship!

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, in company with my colleagues of the House I am paying this inadequate tribute to a distinguished son of my State, Hon. THADDEUS C. SWEET, who has gone from among us to return no more. I can add but little to what has and will be said by those who knew and served with him in this body.

The excellencies of mind and heart which characterized him in his more personal relations reflected in his larger relation as a public man and a servant of the people. Loyalty not only to his friends and his fellow men but to ideals and conviction was the great directing force of his energies in whatever sphere of action they were directed.

He came among us, this friend that has gone, ripe with a record of fruitful public service and achievement in the great State of New York. Many there are among my colleagues from our State who served with him in the lower house at Albany, of which he was the speaker for six years; all of whom gladly testify to his outstanding ability and his sense of justice and fairness to all. To him political virtue was something more than mere subscription to party faith; to him it meant action, deeds, accomplishments for the general good. His sudden and untimely end in the prime and vigor of early manhood leaves us stunned and nonplused. We stand in awe before the majesty of death, to ponder the great mystery of the life beyond the grave.

Mr. Speaker, it should be a source of pride and satisfaction to his family and his friends that without respect to party his colleagues, who have served with him in this historic body, will ever remember him not only for his unsullied character and ability but with the warmest affection for the man and the friend.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the tragic and shocking death of THADDEUS C. SWEET in an airplane accident on May 1, 1928, ended a life of great accomplishment and of greater promise. Success had been his in many walks of life, earned by his own efforts alone; and his future was bright with the prospect of many years of achievement and usefulness. The sudden ending of his career in middle life, while physically strong and mentally vigorous, and while busily and joyously engaged in carrying the many private and public burdens that rested on him so lightly, was a sad loss and a bitter bereavement to his friends and associates and the country he served.

He had a genius for friendship. He delighted in kindly deeds. The Good Samaritan was his guide and pattern. No human being in distress, no matter how humble, ever appealed to him without a prompt and generous response. He truly loved his fellow man. No opponent was big enough to intimidate him or cause him to make obeisance; no one too lowly for his broad, human sympathy. His friends were legion—with such a man it could not be otherwise.

In the community where he lived, his was the sound judgment and quiet forcefulness that directed the affairs of the village and its institutions. In the Legislature of the State of New York, where he served 11 terms, 6 of which as speaker of the assembly, his personality and influence was outstanding. In the Congress, where his third term was interrupted by death, his knowledge of legislation, his experience in business, his wise counsel, his devotion to duty, and his personal charm won him a position of prominence and prestige, as well as the finer tribute of the confidence and affection of his colleagues of both parties.

Our hearts go out in sympathy to his devoted family, suffering from the bitter grief which only faith in divine Providence can assuage. We mourn his loss; we honor his name; we cherish his legacy to us—the memory of happy hours spent with him, the friendship he gave us so freely, and the inspiration of an upright and honorable life.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, the unfortunate accident that caused the untimely death of Hon. THADDEUS C. SWEET was a public misfortune. Prior to his entry into Congress he had a long and successful business experience and training, as well as important legislative service in the New York Legislature, being the speaker of that body for six years. He came to Congress with a sound and ripened judgment in business and legislature. In an unusually short time his ability gave him prominence and his diligence and information in the discharge of his duties commended him to the confidence of the House, which entertained for him the highest esteem. He was universally loved for his manly strength and uprightness. As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means he evidenced marked ability for this important work, and we sincerely regret that he will counsel with us no more.

THOMAS STALKER BUTLER

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, in the death of THOMAS S. BUTLER the State of Pennsylvania lost a distinguished son and the Nation was deprived of a conscientious and courageous public servant.

At the time of his death our late colleague, who we affectionately called "Uncle Tom" was serving his sixteenth term in Congress, and was not only the dean of the Pennsylvania delegation but father of the House, as we designate those longest in consecutive service. In that respect he occupied the same position as other distinguished Pennsylvanians—Kelley, Randall, O'Neill, Harmer, Bingham, and Dalzell.

The Butlers are of ancient lineage in this country, tracing their ancestry from Noble Butler, who was born at Bedminster, England, in 1704, and who came to the United States when a young man. He was assessed in Kennett Township, Pa., 1725–1730; in East Caln, 1734–35; and after 1736 in Uwchland, where land is at present held in the family's name. Records are found in the keeping of the Society of Friends showing that he was an overseer in their meeting. Family records illustrate the fact that John (?) Butler was the progenitor of that line from which Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER was descended. John Butler and his wife, Bersheba (Noble) Butler, were both natives of Bristol, England. They were in the city of Philadelphia prior to April 21, 1711, and from that year to this members of the line have been of prominence in the annals of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER was born at the old family seat in Uwchland Township, near Lionville, Chester County, Pa., November 3, 1854. He was the oldest son of Samuel and Margaretta P. (Woodward) Butler, his father having been a farmer, teacher, and member of the State legislature, serving also as State treasurer. His father was born February 2, 1825, and died February 1, 1891.

In the common schools of Chester County and in Bolmar's Academy of West Chester Mr. BUTLER received his elementary and secondary instruction, then became a student in West Chester State Normal School, being one of the first pupils in the latter institution, 1872. Under Joseph F. Perdue and Judge J. Smith Futhey he studied law and was admitted to the bar of Chester County in 1877 and to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in 1879, at the ages of 22 and 24 years, respectively.

For a brief period Mr. BUTLER practiced his profession alone and independently in West Chester, later forming a partnership with his cousin, Judge William Butler, jr., who had been a student in his law office, and in this connection continued until 1898, when William Butler, jr., was elected to the bench. Meanwhile the firm admitted William S. Windle, a man of brilliant attainments, who had married a sister of William Butler, jr. For a number of years this firm operated under the style of Butler & Windle. In 1888 Mr. BUTLER was chosen to serve as an additional law judge to succeed his former preceptor, Judge Futhey, while William B. Waddell presided on the bench. In 1889 Mr. BUTLER, who had been appointed judge, was a candidate to succeed himself, but was defeated by Hon. Joseph Hemphill by 32 votes. A split in the Republican ranks was given as the cause, the struggle being more over the control of the party than over personalities. The effect was to strengthen him in his determination to engage in the public's service, and hence he came to be through a "lengthening of the cords and strengthening of the stakes" a national rather than a local figure. Had he been elected to the bench in 1889 he might have spent the rest of his life there, rather than in Congress.

Be it said that at all times Mr. BUTLER faithfully represented his constituents in the congressional district comprising Chester and Delaware Counties, and that in all his career there never was a question raised regarding his ability or his integrity or of his personal services in behalf of constituents and the country as a whole. He never grew rich in office and was not given to display, but from the very beginning observed in his manner of living a certain simplicity which won and held for him the confidence and esteem of everyone, creating a neighborly feeling throughout his district in Pennsylvania. He maintained this neighborliness despite the fact that he associated with the greatest men of the Nation and held high positions of trust and honor. Though opportunities for private gain were abundant, he thought of God and home and family, and "trespassed not in the accursed thing."

When Mr. BUTLER went to Congress for his first term, he succeeded John B. Robinson, of Media, Pa., who in his youth had served in the Navy and was a member of the Naval Committee of the House. At that time the Navy had not reached a degree of such high importance. However, dating from the time the Maine was blown up in the harbor of Habana, the Navy sprang into importance, and since then has been a real power to be considered in world affairs. Mr. BUTLER familiarized himself with the service and was constantly beset by officials regarding its urgent needs and appropriations therefor. He was not reared as a naval man, but rather, as he said, as a member of the Uwchland Meeting of Friends, and all his instincts were for peace. However, he thrust himself into the program, labored for the Navy's interests, and was proud of the achievements which it won throughout the world.

The position of a leader always is assailed by opposing forces, and Mr. BUTLER's position was somewhat of an unpleasant one after the World War, when propaganda for and against national-defense measures showed unusual activity, and, moreover, was much better organized than it had been ever before. One side insisted that we should have the greatest navy in the world; the other, with no less adroitness, insisted that our men-of-war be scrapped, and at once, and all swords be beaten into plowshares. Extremists on either side attacked him, and Mr. BUTLER, with these pressing annoyances, took counsel with whom he would and hit upon the course which he believed correct, best for the country; and this he adhered to unflinchingly, at the same time showing respect for those who really were in earnest in their appeals for a more radical and spectacular stand. As chairman of the Naval Committee he enjoyed the absolute confidence of Congress and the people at large, and his district stood by him in all emergencies. On other issues he was equally harassed and heckled, and while he could not declare himself in such a way as would give universal satisfaction, he was credited with having done what was right in his own eyes. Not infrequently, after the "smoke barrage" had blown aside, it was revealed that he had acted on inside information, which had warranted the actions for which he was criticized.

As a public speaker Mr. BUTLER was always popular. He liked nothing better than to meet a group of country people and to talk to them in genial fashion about the changes which had taken place on the farm since he was a lad helping with the field and barn work. Having an easy appreciation of their problems, he kept their hearts light as he talked, and underneath this pleasantness ran an undercurrent of serious thought in their retentive minds. But during his long term in national office he made it a rule to hold aloof from local affairs, preferring to meet his neighbors as such rather than to manage anything among them.

For this reason he permitted himself to show no special interest in civic matters nor to hold public office. In 1927 he consented, however, to accept a position as trustee of State Teachers' College, an institution he had attended when it was a State normal school. He had been a trustee from 1885 to 1889, but after having become active in politics had withdrawn from the board.

Mr. BUTLER was one of the initial promoters of rural free delivery, and it was through his influence that the borough of West Chester had two such deliveries a day for a period of years. He procured the appropriation for the building of the West Chester post office and those in other towns of the district, and did vast service in improving general mail conditions. During the World War he paid a visit to France and mingled with the soldiers of the United States, who received him with a glad welcome. He went into the front trenches, and from various points of view was able to see the operations of the enemy. In addition to his fine ability as a statesman he had those personal qualities which endeared him to all who came in contact with him. This was reflected in the fact that he had not the slightest opposition in his own party, there having been hardly a single active campaign against him in the many terms of his office. One of his characteristics was his interest in young men and women, and his kindly advice and counsel had much to do with the molding of the lives which came under his influence. Particularly was this true with regard to those who gained their first knowledge of the law under his preceptorship. The thoroughness of his training is evidenced by standards maintained by men who were his pupils at law and to the heights to which they have risen in the profession or in other ways in which they have been called upon to serve the public.

Mr. BUTLER married Maud Mary Darlington, daughter of the late Congressman Smedley Darlington, of Faunbrook, East Bradford Township, Chester County, in West Chester on February 20, 1879. She survives her husband, and was to him a most devoted assistant during his years of national service. Much of her time was spent with him in Washington, where she aided him in keeping in touch with noted personalities and in never forgetting his home people.

Mr. and Mrs. Butler became the parents of three sons, who survive their father: (1) Brig. Gen. Smedley Darlington Butler, of the United States Marine Corps; (2) Samuel Butler; and (3) Horace Butler. Also surviving is a sister, Miss Annie M. Butler, who has made her home with his family for many years.

Mr. BUTLER died in Washington on May 26, 1928, following an illness of several weeks brought on by a heart attack. The body was returned to West Chester the day following, and funeral services were held Tuesday afternoon, May 29, under charge of Dr. Charles R. Williamson, pastor of Westminster Presbyterian Church and a speaker of the Society of Friends.

Tributes to the veteran of the Pennsylvania delegation in the House of Representatives were many, and from all parts of the Nation, from persons in all walks of endeavor and all positions in society, from proudest to humblest. Public expressions were everywhere in evidence. Hon. Curtis D. Wilbur, Secretary of the Navy, said:

Chairman BUTLER belonged to the Navy not only because his son, Gen. Smedley Darlington Butler, was in it but more so because his heart was in it. He had a genuine affection for the officers and men of the Navy, and for 30 years had fought their battles on the floor of the House. He saw the Navy in two wars fight for the country he loved. We will all miss the man whom we learned to love as "Uncle Tom."

On the evening of May 31, 1928, the Los Angeles paused for one minute in its flight over the cemetery and scattered flowers upon his grave.

I am indebted to Miss Isabel Darlington, former law partner of Mr. BUTLER, for furnishing me a biographic sketch prepared by a publishing company.

Early in my congressional service I formed a friendship with an admiration for Mr. BUTLER, and when the opportunity came I was happy to serve with him as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee and later to work under his leadership as chairman of that important committee. During that period our associations were more intimate, and I found him to be always able, always intelligent, always fair, never desirous of extravagance, but always desiring the Navy maintained in a high position. He had one quality which develops leadership; that is confidence in his cause and confidence in himself, which no doubt was the reason for his success. An outstanding trait in Mr. BUTLER'S sterling character was his uncompromising loyalty to conviction. He was a man of intense convictions and had the courage to express them, but he fought so fairly, so frankly, and so openly that no one even questioned his sincerity.

Although a Quaker in life and lineage, Mr. BUTLER was nevertheless an enthusiastic advocate of preparedness, and his name is closely woven with the advancement of our Navy during the past 30 years. He was ever ready to fight for an adequate navy and to defend it from assault. One of the last bills he sponsored was the so-called cruiser bill, which only recently passed the Senate and has become a law.

His kindness, his achievements, and his triumphs will always be a precious memory to those who loved him, and I count it as a priceless heritage to have had the privilege of enjoying his friendship.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the life, character, and public services of an individual Member of Congress are matters of importance as well as interest not only to the family and friends of the deceased and to his colleagues in Congress but to the people of the entire country, because it is of the lives, character, and services of the Members individually that the final resultant of service is made up. Each Member contributes his share, which may be large or small; the service may be long or of short duration, but each makes a contribution, and the sum of all is the measure of the effectiveness and usefulness of this body.

The service of THOMAS S. BUTLER in the House of Representatives was far beyond the usual in its length, and all will agree that his contribution during that long period was a very large and substantial one. He entered the House at an age sufficiently young to enable him to become saturated with the spirit of the service of the House, and he was here long enough to thoroughly understand how to make his work most effective.

Others will tell more in detail of his special service as a member and for a long time chairman of the very important Committee on Naval Affairs, and, therefore, I shall only refer to it in passing. It might seem strange to those not familiar with the spirit of service in this House that one of the most peace loving of men, who, in addition, had been brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Society of Friends, should become one of the most valuable members and finally the leader of a committee of the House whose duty it is to deal with the grim realities of preparation for war. If there were inconsistency in such a situation, however, it never appeared to TOM BUTLER. He saw his duty, faced it squarely, and never flinched, flagged, or wavered in the performance of that duty. Through the turbulent period of the war he rose almost to majestic heights as he toiled with his colleagues in dealing with the vexed problems of those days.

If every Member of the House of Representatives should write his own account of TOM BUTLER'S career in Congress, there would, of course, be as many different accounts as there are Members, but in one thing probably all would agree. I doubt not that all would bear testimony to the same fact that no Member of this House during the service of any Member now living has exemplified a more lovable character than TOM BUTLER possessed. The effect of this lovable character was felt in all his relations with his colleagues, for his good nature was contagious and few could resist it. I do not mean that he was always placid, for such he was not. In fact, in times of stress, and when matters which he deemed of great importance were under consideration, he was far from placid, but his intense earnestness always carried the conviction that his heart was right, and for this reason everyone loved him and, if possible, agreed with him.

In a few instances when Members have served for a considerable length of time in the House of Representatives and have particularly endeared themselves to the membership of the House, some affectionate designation has been attached to their names. It was so in TOM BUTLER'S case. Everyone with deepest respect, approaching reverence, called him "TOM BUTLER," and for many years during the latter part of his service here he was called by most Members "Uncle Tom." There is more honor in such a designation than in many a long eulogium. The designation "Uncle Tom" epitomized more than many phrases could be made to do the admiration, respect, honor, and love of his fellow Members. So he lived and moved and did his work among us, beloved by all, and when he went he left a gap that will not soon be filled.

Mr. WOLFENDEN. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 26, 1928, Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER joined that innumerable caravan to the realms above. This beloved statesman was the personification of that oft-repeated expression, "the fullness of life." Once as I stood in the Wanamaker Art Gallery studying the painting, Christ Before Pilate, a little girl stood close by with her mother; then suddenly she ran up to the painting and tried to undo the thongs that tied the Master's hands, and I would that I might paint such a word picture of this outstanding character that we would see him in our midst to-day.

He entered the lower House in 1897 and at once became interested in the naval program. He found wooden vessels and he fought for steel, thereby earning the title of the "father of the steel Navy" after three decades of insistent persistent effort. Each session was an added opportunity for unselfish service to his country and his constituency.

The Butlers are of honored ancestry, dating back to Noble Butler, who was born at Bedminster, England, in 1704, coming to this country when a young man, being assessed in Kenneth Township, Pa., in 1725, and East Calm in 1734, and after 1736 in Uwchland. At this latter place land is still held in the family name, and from this time the Butlers have always been active in the affairs of the Keystone State.

Our friend, the Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER, was born at the family seat in Uwchland Township, Chester County, on November 4, 1855. His father was a member of the State legislature and later served as State treasurer.

He received his scholastic training in the schools of Chester County, being one of the first pupils in the West Chester State Normal. With prophetic vision he studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1877. His firm, which included his cousin, Judge William Butler, jr., attained a high degree of prominence, and in 1888 he was chosen as an additional law judge, but was unsuccessful at the following election.

Eight years later the people of his district sent him to Congress to become a national figure and emblazon his name as one who served to the limit of human endurance. From that time until his death he was in truth a Congressman in all that honored title implies. He gave his attention assiduously and well to rendering the highest degree of service to his country and to the folks back home.

He had the likable trait of making all his callers at ease and established contacts that lasted as long as life itself. Always unassuming, he apparently had no desire to attain wealth, but devoted his energies to properly safeguarding the country.

His work on the Naval Committee is one of the brightest pages in our country's archives. At his inception into this body his knowledge of the needs of the Navy was necessarily limited, but study and experience developed him into an authority on this particular line.

In his early days in Congress there was no pressing need for up-to-minute naval equipment. However, the Spanish-American War sounded a genuine alarm and plainly showed the necessity for a marked change in the naval program. Congressman BUTLER lent his every activity to this call and the Navy became his life work. His monument to-day is fittingly depicted upon the high seas where America can now contend with the other powers of the world.

His work was extremely difficult. At times he had considerable opposition from the pacifists and the economists, but eventually he prevailed. This in itself is a tribute to his vision and justified his position as chairman of the Naval Committee.

Devotion to the work at hand became his life's ambition, nor would he swerve to any other interest, despite all manner of calls on a man marked with his recognized ability.

It always was a matter of keen delight for him to take his friends to those who held the highest positions of trust and honor in the country. His homely virtues won for him undying friendships, and he was constantly acclaimed throughout his district. Congressman BUTLER was admired and beloved by all who knew him as a man who always had the courage of his convictions. This is clearly attested by the continuous wholehearted support he received from his constituency during a period of 31 years of service.

The pressure of business at the Capitol did not in any way lessen his attention to the needs of his district, and the various public buildings in Chester and Delaware Counties are living reminders of his work.

His intense humanity led him to go to the scene of action amid those stirring days when the whole world was rocked with war, and it was there he became more convinced upon a program of adequate naval protection.

He loved the great outdoors and took pride in stocking the fish streams and in the distribution of all varieties of seeds throughout his section. He received valuable counsel from his beloved wife, who was Maud Mary Darlington, of Chester County. She spent much of her time in Washington and was at all times his invaluable aid and companion.

Distinguished guests often visited their home on West Miner Street, West Chester, as well as friends from all parts of the two counties. There was a friendly greeting for all, no matter what their station in life. Such visits never failed to increase the admiration for this statesman to whom passing years brought increased responsibilities and labors.

He had three sons. His son, Brig. Gen. Smedley Darlington Butler, delighted his father by the manner in which he handled the position of director of public safety of Philadelphia under Mayor Kendrick. The Congressman's wife and his sister still continue their home in West Chester.

Last spring the entire country was plunged into sorrow when the news came that this fine character, beloved and admired by all who knew him, had laid down his mantle and passed to the Great Beyond.

The funeral services were held on Tuesday afternoon, May 29. Dr. Charles R. Williamson, of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, officiated, and a speaker from the Society of Friends. He was laid at rest in Oaklands.

His name stands among the leaders on glory's page. Kind, sympathetic letters poured into the old homestead. His Washington office was flooded with letters that told in part of the great loss sustained. It seemed everyone was affected by the passing of this patriarch who only a few weeks before had appeared on the front page of all the leading newspapers telling of his fight on the floor of the House for increased battleships.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, Speaker of the House, said:

TOM BUTLER was a unique character in the House. Everybody was fond of him. Without question he was one of the men who accomplished genuine results for the proper increase of the Navy; one of the few men who have done really big things for it. He was absolutely consistent in that direction, and was for many years, especially since the Washington treaties, for Mr. BUTLER insisted day in and day out upon the maintenance, at least in reasonable degree, of the 5–5–3 ratio. He always had that in mind. If the veteran Pennsylvanian had done nothing more than that, his place in the congressional history would be secure, even if he had not been at the hour of his going the oldest Member of the House in continuous years of service and the holder of the longest continuous record of service for all time.

It was my privilege to know "Uncle Tom" intimately through the later years of his life, and I count myself indeed fortunate in having a close contact with this outstanding leader. He was positive and earnest and derived intense pleasure from his work on the Naval Committee, yet was never too busy to lend a willing ear for some personal service. He had the happy faculty of greeting you in such an intimate, personal manner that you always looked forward to the next visit.

In the various meetings held in his district his introduction was a signal for a wonderful demonstration. His constituency fairly idolized him and took deep pride in his achievements.

The poet has well said:

Full minded, wise, and kindly just,
Instinctively we turn to such a trust,
Through men so stamped we grow from age to age,
And write our progress on immortal page.

Mr. WATRES. Mr. Speaker, there are few men qualified to adequately appraise the long service rendered by our friend THOMAS S. BUTLER. His is a record unexcelled for loyal devotion through his years to the interest of his country and his State

For those of us who served with him during the latter part of his life it remains only to cherish the inspiring memory of his example and to give expression as best we can to our sense of personal loss.

He sought to accomplish his purposes as a legislator, not by dependence on skillful maneuver in debate but by sole dependence on the justice of his cause.

His great source of power was his ability to seek it not from within but above and beyond himself.

Above all, he manifested faith in and a love for his associates which was returned in like degree. He was loved by his associates as it is given few men to be loved.

His life will continue to be a source of inspiration as long as there remain in this body men who had the privilege of serving with him.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, the death of Congressman THOMAS S. BUTLER takes from Congress one of its most influential figures; from Pennsylvania one of her greatest sons; from America one of her truest patriots.

Though he was father of the House at the time of his passing, Congressman BUTLER had the spirit of youth in his heart. With a dauntless faith he refused to admit the impossible. Obstacles and difficulties in his way only gave greater zest to the struggle to overmaster them.

The light of friendship was ever in his eyes. He had a cheery word and a sunny smile for all. He was an everlasting fountain of good humor as well as sound judgment. He won and held the affections of his colleagues and his constituents by the simplicity and sincerity which made him truly great.

Father of the new and great United States Navy, Congressman BUTLER made invaluable contribution to the Nation he loved and served. His long life was devoted to the best interests of the Republic. Patriotic love for America and her people burned like a fire within him. He counted no effort too great if it would add a little to the safety, security, happiness, and prosperity of America.

He was a believer in peace and in the justice which alone makes peace possible and permanent. He was a member of the Quakers, and its name, Society of Friends, fitted him well. Never did he act with haste or prejudice upon the great measures which came before the Committee on Naval Affairs, over which he presided as chairman. Always he asked one question, "Will this legislation advance the common welfare?" Upon the answer depended his attitude.

During the World War, in the pivotal weeks of July and August, 1918, he studied our naval and military activities at first hand in the war zone. One of my treasured memories is that of the journey homeward from Brest to New York with Congressman BUTLER in early September, 1918.

His vast information about the Navy and his unfaltering faith in the cause of America brought all his shipmates around him to sit at his feet as learners and pupils. He was like a lighthouse in the storm, radiating courage and encouragement to all with whom he came in contact.

Congressman BUTLER was an exemplary influence in every walk of life. As a legislator he led fearlessly along the highway of true progress. As a friend he was true hearted and helpful in his comradeship. As father and husband he exemplified the highest and best virtues, and the memory of his tender love must be consolation to those he left behind.

No man has been more missed in all the long history of the House of Representatives than this genial and delightful soul, this brave and competent leader.

We who know him would have held him with us always. But our wish could not avail and amid the grief of a great host of friends he was laid away in the God's Acre at old Chester beneath a wilderness of flowers.

Still he is not dead. His character and his deeds live on as inspiration to the generations to come. As long as America endures there will be grateful tributes paid to Congressman THOMAS S. BUTLER for the example and service achieved during many years in the lawmaking body of the Nation.

And all those who knew him will say, with Tennyson:

I climb the hill; from end to end,
Of all the landscape underneath,
I find no place that does not breathe
Some gracious memory of my friend.
And in my spirit will I dwell
And dream my dream and hold it true.
For though my lips may breathe adieu,
I can not think the thing farewell.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, during the comparatively short life of our Republic the State of Pennsylvania has contributed an exceedingly large number of men to public life who have distinguished themselves in most unusual degree.

In that group will be included the name of our late colleague, THOMAS S. BUTLER. Much has been said and will be said by others touching the life of this illustrious son of the great Keystone State. Even so, there are a few observations that I am inclined to make.

When our late colleague was called from our midst by the grim reaper, he left an indelible record in the minds of the Members of Congress with whom he labored for so many years.

No Member of Congress can serve long before an appraisal of his worth and ability will have been made by his colleagues. This appraisal is made upon the basis of the unconscious everyday life and action of the Member himself. It is made through contact, through observance of the Member in his deportment among his fellows; through the degree with which the Member measures his words; through candor or lack of candor; through habits that reflect carelessness or accuracy, and that indicate studiousness and attention or their opposites.

A KINDLY MAN

The most outstanding characteristic of TOM BUTLER as we knew him was kindliness. There was not a Member of the House of Representatives who did not love the man.

When the doors of the Fifty-eighth Congress opened to me TOM BUTLER had already established himself in the affection and the confidence of the membership of this great body. He had already claimed their regard, their admiration, and their affection. He was a man in the prime of life, yet he had seen years of service in the House of Representatives.

A new Member, I was drawn to TOM BUTLER because of his friendliness, because of his kindliness of soul, and I know that he reciprocated toward me in measure that was heaped up and overflowing. For many years, in speaking to me, he would address me by the affectionate term of "son."

During the later years of his life TOM BUTLER was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, at a time when I was chairman of the committee handling the naval supply bill. We understood each other. We did the closest of the teamwork. We did not always agree, but we had faith each in the other, and at all times I recognized and cherished that great, fine, and generous soul.

A LOVER OF PEACE

Strangely enough, our colleague, of Quaker ancestry and training, was assigned for the most responsible work of his entire career to the great Naval Affairs Committee of the House. Mr. BUTLER was a man who loved peace. He believed in accord among nations, just as he believed in amity among people of the community in which he lived; and yet he believed that peace and amity could best be preserved by a great nation, as by an individual, through its maintenance of self-respect; through its devotion to the doctrines of righteousness as recognized by civilized peoples of the world; and, if need be, through the defense of these very principles by physical power, even as the Master of old drove the money changers from the temple.

Imbued with this philosophy, Mr. BUTLER was a most valuable member of the committee with which his name had come to be associated. He realized the folly of unbridled and unrestrained naval construction upon the part of the nations of the world. He realized the folly of such a program if adopted by the people of the United States.

A moment ago I said that TOM BUTLER was a kindly man, and may I add that, paradoxical as it may seem, only men of that striking characteristic should be charged with responsibilities that involve the lives of people, the rights of men, the destinies of humankind.

In its larger aspect, kindliness is statesmanship. It is statesmanship in that it has regard for humanity, regard for all peoples.

In translating into action his convictions BUTLER stood for two things: Teamwork among the nations of the world, looking to the reduction of armaments and their maintenance in moderation through international understandings; and in the absence of international understandings the maintenance by the United States of a sizeable Naval Establishment.

In carrying forward these principles courage was required, courage to stand against those who would have made the welfare of the country subservient to militarism; courage, on the other hand, in resisting the earnest entreaties and importunities of those who believe that even now an example should be made by the United States of practical disarmament that would result in other nations following in our footsteps, and thereby relieve the peoples of the world of the burdens of militarism and remove the ready means that are believed to incite misunderstandings and war.

HE WAS A MAN OF COURAGE

One of the notable characteristics of TOM BUTLER was courage. TOM BUTLER was earnest in his deliberations, honest with himself and his fellow man, and when he had reached a conclusion that satisfied his own soul he had the strength of character to stand for his convictions.

A time when BUTLER was called upon to manifest courage was when, as the ranking member of the Republican Party of the Committee on Naval Affairs, he supported the resolution in the spring of 1917 recognizing a state of war existing between the United States and the Central Powers of Europe. His courage and resolution were drawn upon when later in the same year he stood against the dominant control of the Military Affairs Committee of the House and favored the policy of the selective draft for the building up of the Army of the United States as against the policy of undertaking to build up the Army through the volunteer system.

The war over, the President of the United States in France seeking to work out not only a formula for the conclusion of peace but for the maintenance in the greatest degree possible of world peace among the nations throughout the years to come, TOM BUTLER stood for a policy calculated to outline a program for increasing the naval strength of the United States under the leadership of the late President Wilson, a program that the then President of our country believed, if declared to the world, would be of the greatest assistance to him in establishing a formula under which a greater measure of peace and accord among the nations might be attained.

So, then, the oustanding characteristics of our late beloved colleague were, as I see them, kindliness in all his dealings, sincerity of purpose, loyalty to country, courage, and resolution of soul, all of which blended into that fine attitude of approach with which he undertook the heavy responsibilities that were intrusted to his care.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, when Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER passed from this earth on the 26th day of May, 1928, after having served his country for 32 years, Capitol Hill lost one of its most spectacular characters, for it was to Mr. BUTLER to whom the House of Representatives had long looked for leadership and advice in matters affecting the United States Navy.

He had a ready wit and a homely expression which few, if any, Members of the House could parry, and his colleagues were ever ready to place complete confidence in any expression of opinion which came from the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There are few men in the House to-day who command the same confidence that so long reposed in Mr. BUTLER.

The most complicated pieces of legislation affecting Navy personnel were often passed by the House without a roll call after Mr. BUTLER had told the House that he himself believed the legislation to be sound and in the best interest of the country. Detailed explanation of these complicated bills was rarely required of Chairman BUTLER. The House knew that a bill to go through Mr. BUTLER's hands and reach the final stage of passage must have merit or "Uncle Tom" would never have reported it.

It was my very great pleasure to serve on the Committee on Naval Affairs with Mr. BUTLER for nearly 15 years, and I am only sorry that he is not here to see the 15-cruiser bill finally enacted into law and being appropriated for. The present Navy and Marine Corps owe much to Mr. BUTLER and his constant promotion of the national defense during 32 years' service on the Committee on Naval Affairs, during the latter 9 years of which he was its distinguished chairman.

To recount the numberless bills which bore his name, and which finally became enacted into law, would take a long time, but I am sure that he took a more active part in Navy and Marine Corps legislation than any man who has ever lived on this earth. He loved both of these services and worked for them conscientiously, almost until he was taken from us by Him above.

When Uncle TOM BUTLER was called by the Great Reaper, Pennsylvania lost one of its outstanding citizens and the Nation lost a great public servant. His words and deeds will be followed by others on Capitol Hill for hundreds of years to come.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the pale messenger that never tires and never pities, the messenger that called Sappho from her odes and Letitia Landon away from her sorrow, the messenger that called Byron to where he could sleep, and piloted Poe to the "misty dim regions of Weir," did on the 26th day of May, 1928, knock upon the door and reach upon the inexorable roll call the name of THOMAS S. BUTLER and guide him into that radiant hereafter, of which hope is the creator and faith the defender. A soul which needed no cleansing to fit it for the companionship of the just.

His death has caused a great loss to the Nation, to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and to his family and friends.

THOMAS S. BUTLER, of West Chester, Pa., was born in Uwchland, Chester County, Pa., November 4, 1855. He was elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress and succeeding Congresses and re-elected to the Seventieth Congress. He was the father of the House, having a continuous service of nearly 32 years. The only committee on which he ever served was the Committee on Naval Affairs. He was made chairman of this committee in the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress and served in that capacity until his death.

He was by far the best-informed man on naval affairs in the Congress, and I am not overstating his capabilities when I say that no man within my knowledge has ever shown such dissecting powers as were at his command. He was a student, and acquired his knowledge, as all truly learned men acquire theirs, by work and reflection. He was well acquainted with the technical features of naval law and naval regulations.

During the time that Mr. BUTLER was chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee much important legislation was enacted. The last bill of national importance which he sponsored and guided through the House was for 15 cruisers and 1 airplane carrier. His loss to the committee can not be measured. He believed in a strong, adequate navy; one that should be ever ready for war, but that would never be required to fire a single shot.

He was a strict party man and had the confidence of his party associates. As a Member of Congress he had the respect of his political opponents because of his loyalty and adherence to his party.

He was a wise legislator, in that he possessed a correct vision of what was necessary to be done in order to furnish the Government with its needful defense.

It has been said:

Honesty is the oak around which all other virtues cling; without that they fall and, groveling, die in woods and dust.

The paths of his public life were crowded with vast power and responsibility, and yet no stain ever followed his footsteps. His hands were never soiled by the betrayal of a public or private trust. He served, as few men have, with courage and manly bearing, with no thought of self, for the deadly virus of selfishness had not cankered his soul. Uppermost in his mind were his family, his country, and his God.

His splendid qualities, recognized by all who came in contact with him either socially or officially, and his brilliant mind and devotion to his duties and the causes he espoused, endeared him to all of his colleagues in Congress; and, Mr. Speaker, I measure my words when I say that there never was a deeper or more universal regret on account of the death of any Member of Congress than was felt when Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER answered the last roll call.

The world is better and the people happier for his having lived; and in his death his constituents lost a courteous, faithful, and efficient Representative, his State one of its most distinguished citizens, his country one of its most able lawmakers, and his colleagues one of their best-beloved associates.

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We count the time by heart throbs.
He most lives who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Mr. Speaker, I appropriate here, as a part of my remarks, the tribute of Hon. W. R. Coyle, a Member of the Sixty-ninth Congress and Member elect to the Seventy-first Congress from the thirtieth Pennsylvania district, who served on the Naval Affairs Committee under the chairmanship of our deceased colleague.

TRIBUTE OF HON. W. R. COYLE TO THOMAS S. BUTLER

To have known Mr. BUTLER in the fullness of his experience was to realize the power of love and the glory of service personified. In him were all those elements of character which make men to be beloved of other men—the simplicity of the poet; the directness of the mathematician; the frankness of the child.

No higher privilege could come to any new Member of Congress than has come to me through being accorded his friendship. No father could have shown more consideration for a son for whom he desired a repetition of his own career of service. From the fullness of that experience, gained during more than 30 years of contact, both with the great and with those of low degree, he imparted in apt and terse phases, not only earlier estimates of men and events, but those current as well.

I never knew a broader tolerance nor one so sincere in conceding to other men the right of each to his own opinion and belief. The one rebuke I had from him, administered as it was with affectionate understanding, came because I failed to show this tolerance. Even this great and gentle heart had, however, no thought of tolerance for the man or nation that sought to injure the country he loved and served or hamper or weaken his boys in blue or khaki who carried that country's bright flag in war. Self-seeking was unknown in him and abhorred by him. By birthright, by instinct a lover of peace, he fought and plead through an active and long life for adequate arms and equipment for the boys of the first line—the Navy.

Surely these boys, a'low and aloft and in the surface fleet, with affectionate understanding, will note and regret the passing of this great heart—truly the father of our modern Navy—and feel toward him, the active advocate of preparedness, as Kipling felt toward Lord Roberts:

"But from his life a new life springs
Through all the years to come
And the glory is the least of things
That follow this man home."

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, "THOMAS S. BUTLER, Republican" was the language upon the printed page of Congressional Directories since the beginning of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and so it was until the second session of the Seventieth Congress, when it was among the missing—THOMAS S. BUTLER had finished a life of activity and usefulness in the public service in which he had grown old. His public service is known by all men who read, but it is not in terms of public service that I love to think of him—distinguished as that service was.

I came to Congress 20 years later—a Democrat—and before I had an opportunity to observe and analyze his public service, I was honored by his tender of personal friendship. And so I have always thought of him, not as "THOMAS S. BUTLER, Republican" but as THOMAS S. BUTLER, friend.

Often out of office hours we would meet in some quiet place, giving or taking advice—Republican to Democrat or Democrat to Republican—on questions of public policy, giving no thought at all to the fact that we were not of the same political faith. Many and many a time we had our little intimate conferences and so, mutual respect, confidence, and friendship grew to mutual affection. He mourned with me in time of great sorrow and in later years smiled with me in my joys. He was a kindly man, a wise counsellor, a devoted friend. As such I loved to think of him, and so I shall remember him until my own "little life is rounded with a sleep."

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to go into details of the civil and political career of Mr. BUTLER, for others far better qualified to speak along these lines will tell of his work for his community and State. I would confine my remarks to his service on the Naval Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, and in testifying, out of the fullness of my heart, to the qualities and characteristics which endeared him to those with whom he came in contact.

Mr. BUTLER had served on the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives for 31 years, having been appointed a member of this committee when he was elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress. He acted as chairman of this great committee since 1919.

The work of the Naval Affairs Committee is confined to proposed legislation affecting the naval arm of the military service of the United States. Properly speaking, there should be no partisanship on such a committee. Under the chairmanship of Mr. BUTLER, during my membership, there was none. He frequently stated that he knew no party where the defense of his country was the issue. I never heard him indicate that he had a partisan bias to any question. Every member was urged by him to express his views on every proposition before the committee, and he frequently changed his opinion after having had a full discussion. He gave apparently as much weight to the views of the most recent minority member as he did to those of his own party.

He presided with the utmost fairness and courtesy to every member of his committee, and gave everyone full opportunity for a presentation of his views. In fact, his chief delight was to call his committee around him at a table and there hold an informal discussion on the merits of proposed legislation. He hated formality and with simple directness brought out many angles of a subject that might never have been considered under the limitation of formal rules of procedure. Sometimes, in fact, there was some grumbling about the laxness with which he presided, but when the discussion was ended it was found that there was not left in the mind of any member any thought that his views had been arbitrarily ignored. If the majority disagreed with him, he gracefully agreed to support their view. With such an example before the committee, where even the chairman did not try to force his opinion, the members could do no less than act harmoniously. Consequently, every measure favorably reported received the unanimous support of the committee on the floor.

His knowledge of the Navy and its needs was unsurpassed by any Member of Congress, and I doubt if many high-ranking officers of the Navy knew as fully as he did the complex legislative needs of the service. He gave his full attention to it and studied it throughly, item by item. Each and every bill received his minute attention. He had a well-trained, independent, courageous, and an essentially honest mind, and he was conscientious in the application of these principles to the matter in hand. He determined for himself the right of every cause and fought bravely in the expression of his views. There was no compromise if the question was of right or wrong, but if it was a matter of expediency or propriety, he never hesitated to join hands with the majority if he was of the opinion that there was any doubt as to the correctness of his view.

His outstanding characteristic I always thought was his patriotism and his devotion to the duty of serving his country. He was a Quaker, but a "fighting Quaker" when his country called him to its defense. His love for his country was exemplified in his love for the Navy, the country's first line of defense. His clear mind saw the necessity for an adequate navy, if his country was to protect itself from attack and aggression. He would never have favored a war of aggression, but neither would he stand for an insult to his beloved country or mistreatment of its people. So he threw himself with energy into a study of world conditions in their application to our naval needs. It is no secret that he did not agree with the administration on one occasion as to the enlargement of our cruiser strength, and he vigorously maintained his view to such a degree and exhibited such striking knowledge of the subject that the House supported him in the increase desired. It was a great tribute to the confidence his colleagues had in his judgment and to his courage in presenting his views. Patriotism was the keynote of his character. He loved to serve his country, and his constituents recognized his peculiar fitness for the service and kept him in office for nearly 32 years. Of all the men who have had the distinction of service in this great legislative body since the beginning of our Government, few have had such a testimonial to the public confidence in their patriotic service and integrity. No man could have had such a record without possessing great qualities of head and heart.

The qualities which placed him high in the affectionate regard of his constituents through all the mutations of political life earned him the love and esteem of his fellow Members. Many there were who with deep affection called him "Uncle Tom," but by many of his colleagues he was loved rather as a father than as an uncle. I welcome this opportunity to express my appreciation for many courtesies and kindnesses, little acts in themselves but contributing largely to the comfort and experience of a younger man of the opposite party in the service of the country. He is not dead who lives in the memory of his fellow men.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I come to pay a brief tribute of respect to the memory of my good friend, THOMAS S. BUTLER. He served with distinction through the Fifty-fifth and succeeding Congresses until the time of his death. I came to know him well when I was placed on the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which he was chairman, a position which he was holding when he answered the last call. Never will I forget my first meeting with him after I had been named on that committee. He tenderly placed his arms around me and said, "My boy, I am glad that you are on our committee and I want to tell you that we do not have any politics in our committee." Here in this body when at times we are so sharply divided by party lines it was good to me to know that under the leadership of Mr. BUTLER on this great committee the welfare of our country would be the paramount consideration. I do not believe that in our committee work Mr. BUTLER was ever influenced by party consideration. His rugged honesty and lovable disposition endeared him to all. He served in Congress for more than 30 years, giving his life and his splendid talent to his country's service. I had the honor to be one of the committee to accompany his remains to the cemetery in his home town, West Chester, Pa., and the great gathering of his neighbors and friends on that solemn occasion attested the love and affection which a grateful constituency had for the one who had served them so long, so faithfully, and so well.

HENRY RIGGS RATHBONE

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, HENRY R. RATHBONE is the subject of these few remarks inserted in the RECORD by virtue of the leave to insert heretofore granted.

I leave to others, and particularly to the words of Hon. CHARLES S. DENEEN, hereby attached to and made a part of these remarks, the recital of Mr. RATHBONE'S services in this Nation.

And in view of the fact that we are deprived on this occasion of hearing from Mr. RATHBONE, himself, concerning his services in this House, I content myself with quoting a number of his own public statements concerning his aims and aspirations.

And I take the liberty to add a few incidents connecting me with Mr. RATHBONE in a very long acquaintance.

I knew Mr. RATHBONE for 28 years, from May, 1900, to the 15th day of last July, 1928.

I have in my office and on my desk here in Washington a large and handsome inkstand, the base of which is 20 by 10 inches, and which is surmounted by a bust in bronze of Ulysses S. Grant, in full uniform as General of the Armies of America, full general. You all know that he was twice President in "reconstruction days," and before that, by my own father's action, was colonel of the Twenty-first Volunteer Infantry in 1861.

This inkstand, with its significant bronze bust of the old "Silent Commander," U. S. Grant, was presented to me on the day of my own inauguration as governor, January 14, 1901, by that political organization, still prominent and powerful, the Hamilton Club, of Chicago. And the happy and handsome man who made the presentation speech that bright day was HENRY R. RATHBONE.

The place was the governor's mansion at Springfield. Seeing as I do the old commander on my desk ever morn and noon and evening, I am reminded often of that eloquent address delivered by Mr. RATHBONE on that occasion.

Happy, indeed, was that hour of achievement to me; and happy, indeed, was that speech of RATHBONE.

I can never forget Mr. RATHBONE'S appearance and bearing at that time. He was just 10 years younger than I—he was just 30 and I just 40. He was very dramatic.

His physique was always superb and compelling, as we all know. His gestures and voice were always correct. Likewise his attitude.

I recall that I said to myself at that time, "I would like that man to be a part of my administration."

But that thing never happened, for the reason that Mr. RATHBONE never asked or sought, directly or indirectly, so far as I know, any State office or preferment.

However, this did happen: In 1908 he made a hundred speeches for me, and, of course, they were all careful, truthful, and—I thought and still think—admirable.

Campaigning in Illinois is always strenuous, and campaigning in Chicago, as all men know, is superstrenuous.

In 1908 occurred the first state-wide primary in Illinois; my recollection is that many Democrats aspired to the Democratic nomination for governor, but only two Republicans sought the nomination for governor—DENEEN and YATES. Governor DENEEN won. The majority was less than 10,000, but it was decisive. All the losers accepted the decision, RATHBONE and YATES as cheerfully as any.

It was always so with Mr. RATHBONE. Repeated disappointments in his early candidacies for Congressman at large did not deter him from persevering until ultimate victory was his again and again.

During all his service as Congressman at large I was his colleague. His service was a strenuous and ever more strenuous effort to be a real Congressman and a true public servant.

Once upon a time an Illinois United States Senator called his son to his knee and said:

My son, I want you to grow up and serve the Republic.

So it was with this man; he strove to serve the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, I think it appropriate, as showing his aims and aspirations, to insert here a half dozen excerpts from an address delivered by Mr. RATHBONE on May 29, 1928, as follows:

REVIEW OF MY RECORD IN CONGRESS

Mr. RATHBONE. Mr. Speaker, to my constituents, the people of Illinois, under the leave granted to Members of the House of Representatives of printing in the RECORD their own statements on any subject, I am taking this oportunity to give a brief review of my record in Congress. I am serving my third term in the House of Representatives, having been elected in 1922 a Member of the Sixty-eighth Congress. I am again a candidate for reelection as Congressman at large. I shall stand or fall by the record I have made, and I welcome this opportunity of rendering an account of my stewardship to my friends and constituents, who have so generously given me their confidence and support.

BUSINESS

I have consistently supported throughout my congressional career economy and business management in all the affairs of government. I have voted for tax reduction, lowering of the income-tax rates, raising of the exemption limits, and the cutting down of the nuisance taxes, as well as the abolition of the war tax on automobiles and auto parts. I have also voted for a revision of the postal rates and for legitimate and necessary expenditures on public buildings.

MERCHANT MARINE

I have voted for the merchant marine bill in order to promote American commerce and keep our flag upon the seas.

AGRICULTURE

Every measure that has come before the House of Representatives since I have been a Member of that body in the interests of agriculture has had my earnest and enthusiastic support. Among these have been the various bills for the stabilization of prices for farm products, the corn sugar bill, the corn borer bill, and the Hoch resolution providing for a reduction of freight rates on farm products. The farmers of our State and Nation can count upon my continued cooperation with them in all their efforts to bring about a better condition of American agriculture.

IMMIGRATION

Believing that it is essential that America should be kept American and that our standard of living and citizenship should not be lowered, I have wholeheartedly supported restriction of immigration. However, I have also supported the Jenkins bill, which sought to mitigate some of the harshness of the present law and to permit of parents and children of immigrants already in this country to be reunited with their families, without the number already established by law being exceeded.

VETERANS

Hardly a day has passed since I have become a Member of Congress that I have not had an opportunity of rendering some aid to the service men or their dependents. There has not been a measure in their interests that I have not gladly supported, among these being the adjusted compensation act, various hospitalization bills, the disabled emergency officers' bill, and the Civil and Spanish War pension bills. At the instance of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, I have introduced a bill providing for a system of pensions for World War veterans.

RADIO

Firmly believing that the radio is one of the greatest civilizing agencies of the present age, I have supported legislation to bring order out of chaos, prevent interference, and place broadcasting on a sound and permanent basis.

PRESERVING HISTORIC MEMORIES

The memory of the past is the inspiration of the future. Believing firmly in the importance of preserving historic sites, I have introduced a number of bills, which have aroused great interest throughout the Nation. Among these is the bill for the purchase of the famous Oldroyd collection of Lincoln relics, which has become a law. Other bills of a similar character are three bills providing for the survey and construction of Lincoln memorial highways running through and past practically all of the places where Abraham Lincoln and his parents lived and where the most important events of his life took place before he went to Washington. I have also introduced a bill for the reconstruction of Old Ford's Theater and the making of that historic building into a Lincoln museum and central headquarters of the Grand Army of the Republic, a bill for the rehabilitation of the house where Lincoln died, and a bill for the erection of a suitable monument to George Rogers Clark at Fort Gage, Ill.

FOREIGN RELATIONS

While I have supported every measure for reasonable national defense, I have also done everything in my power to promote international good will and the peace of the world. I offered an amendment to the naval appropriation bill in the Sixty-eighth Congress, which was later adopted, in favor of the cooperation of this country with other nations in an attempt to bring about a further limitation and reduction of naval armaments. I have also sought to define what I conceived to be the true policy which this country should follow in the matter of our foreign investments by a resolution which I have introduced. This resolution contains a declaration that the United States will not go to war, intervene, nor exert armed or economic pressure upon other nations in order to compel the payment of private debts.

I trust that the foregoing brief summary will give to my constituents and to those interested some idea of the things that I have stood for. I shall stand for the same principles in the future. My record is my platform.

I am deeply grateful to the 7,000,000 people of the State of Illinois for their confidence and support. I have but one ambition—to serve them and the Nation to the very best of my ability.

Mr. Speaker, I present, as a part of my extension of remarks, a copy of the address delivered at Mr. RATHBONE'S funeral in Chicago July 18, 1928, by Hon. CHARLES S. DENEEN, United States Senator from Illinois, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE HON. CHARLES S. DENEEN AT THE FUNERAL OF CONGRESSMAN HENRY R. RATHBONE ON JULY 18, 1928

Some time ago Mr. RATHBONE said to a friend at a Masonic funeral that when he passed away he hoped that the Masonic ritual would be repeated at his own funeral. The simplicity of the ritual and the nobility of its sentiments appealed to his mind and to his heart. To him the universality and the democracy of death called for a common expression of sorrow from and of sympathy to surviving relatives and friends.

In harmony with the ceremonies on this occasion, may I present briefly a few facts about his life and his career.

HENRY RIGGS RATHBONE was born in Washington, D. C., February 12, 1870. He came of a family of unusual intellectual qualities and of high social station. His father was a graduate of Union College, was a volunteer soldier in the Civil War, and held the rank of colonel at its close. His mother was a woman of high station and of unusual social and intellectual attainments. It is generally known that Mr. RATHBONE'S father and his mother, before their marriage, were guests of President and Mrs. Lincoln in the box at Ford's Treater at the time of the assassination of the great emancipator, and that his father was wounded while endeavoring to protect the martyred President.

His maternal grandfather was the Hon. Ira Harris, at one time a judge of the Court of Appeals of New York. He was one of the three founders of the Albany Law School, one of the oldest law schools in the country, was active in the organization of the Republican Party, and in 1860 was elected a Member of the United States Senate from New York, where he was a staunch supporter of President Lincoln throughout the Civil War.

His paternal grandfather was a successful business man, and at one time was the mayor of the city of Albany, N. Y.

Mr. RATHBONE had unusual educational advantages and training. He was educated at Phillips Academy at Andover, Mass., at Yale University, at Albany Law School, and at the University of Wisconsin. After completing his studies he came to Chicago and entered upon the practice of his profession. During his college days Mr. RATHBONE had indicated a decided aptitude for public speaking. He was chosen class orator at Yale. He was selected to represent his graduating class at the Albany Law School. His training and his ambition to be a public speaker caused him to prepare himself for the trial of cases in the courts, but before he entered upon this branch of the law he made an exhaustive investigation of the law of negligence, reading every case in the appellate court and in the supreme court of this State, and thus became so familiar with the cases that he could cite the controlling principles in the leading ones without reference to the books.

He soon took rank among the prominent trial lawyers in our courts and acquired a large and lucrative practice. A lawyer who was an office associate of Mr. RATHBONE in his early practice told me yesterday that Mr. RATHBONE prepared his cases with unremitting patience and toil; that he mastered the facts and the law in the cases intrusted to his care. These labors accounted for his ease and poise in court and his ability to present clearly and forcibly the issues involved.

While he was engaged in the arduous practice of the law he dreamed of a larger field of activity and usefulness. Four years ago, when we were traveling through the State in a campaign, I rode with him at times for a number of hours, and on one occasion he told me that after his admission to the bar he had an opportunity, through the aid of influential friends, to be appointed to a prominent position in the legal department of the Government at Washington but that he made up his mind that he would go West and establish himself as a lawyer, with the hope and expectation that after he had accumulated a competence he would direct his energies to political life and return to Washington as a Member of Congress.

This high purpose was never out of his mind. His rare gifts of eloquence brought him many invitations to speak before churches, lodges, patriotic assemblies, and in schools and other institutions of learning. It is no exaggeration to say that few lawyers or public men in our city have spoken more frequently than he or over a longer period of years. His reputation soon extended beyond the city of Chicago, and invitations came to him from all parts of the State.

As in the law, he prepared himself thoroughly for public speaking. He pursued a systematic course of reading and study in literature, economics, politics, history, and constitutional law. Because of this rigid discipline he was able to speak intelligently, interestingly, and eloquently on a variety of subjects and on any public occasion.

He did not confine his public speaking to ceremonious occasions and large audiences but he went where he was asked, regardless of the size of the audience, and at every engagement he gave to his audience the best that was in his mind and heart. In this way he established a solid reputation as an orator and as a speaker well informed on public questions.

Mr. RATHBONE had executive and administrative abilities of a high order. He was unanimously elected president of the Hamilton Club, of Chicago, in 1916, and his administration met with the general approval of the members of the club. During the presidential campaign of 1916, on assignment of the national committee, Mr. RATHBONE conducted a training school for public speakers for the campaign.

During the World War Mr. RATHBONE devoted practically all his time to patriotic work. He was chairman of a special committee of the Chicago Bar Association which outlined the activities to be pursued by lawyers in connection with the war. Plans drafted by the committee were submitted by him to a conference of delegates of the State and local bar associations at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., and at the annual convention of the American Bar Association.

The war committee of the local association handled 2,000 cases a month, giving free legal advice and rendering assistance to soldiers, sailors, and their families. Lawyers were furnished to the exemption and to the appeal boards. So well was the work done that Mr. RATHBONE was called to different bar associations of the country and of Canada to relate the plans of the Chicago committee and to explain its work.

Mr. RATHBONE made a large number of speeches in Illinois and other States during the war. Twice he toured the State, once with the Jackie Band and another time with a war exhibition train in behalf of the third and fourth Liberty loan drives.

Mr. RATHBONE was an active member of the Chicago Association of Commerce and served on a number of its important committees.

Such was his preparation for the political career with which we are all familiar. In 1922 he was elected Congressman at large for our State. He was elected for three successive terms thereafter and was the nominee of his party for that high office at the time of his untimely death.

Mr. RATHBONE entered upon his work at the National Capitol with great pride and joy. The measures relating to social service first enlisted his attention, and he thereafter became interested in the bill for the amendment to the child labor law, the pension bills, the bills relating to the salaries and the conditions of work of the postal employees, the soldiers' bonus bill, the hospitalization measures for disabled veterans, and the workmen's compensation bill.

He was especially interested in the municipal affairs at Washington, the city of his birth. He favored extending the right of suffrage to the inhabitants of the District of Columbia. He became interested in the public schools and in the District of Columbia Rent Commission.

His interest in the District was quickly recognized, and he was in demand as a speaker on a great many public occasions in the District. A number of times he spoke over the radio on matters of local interest to the residents of Washington.

He was diligent in his studies of measures of general interest. His industry and his talents made a place for him in the National House of Representatives. Some time ago he was chosen the orator to deliver the address to the House on Lincoln's Birthday.

This is not the time nor the occasion to speak in great detail of his services to his State and to the Nation. In due time the House of Representatives will set apart a day for tributes to his memory by his fellow Members.

Of his personal character and characteristics I am sure he would not wish me to make more than brief mention. He made friends easily. He enjoyed friendships and held them tenaciously. He was pleased to render services to friends. He was kind by nature, not given to saying harsh words about others. He was a man of broad sympathies. He would not turn away from his office the poor who needed professional advice and aid. He was scrupulously careful about his financial obligations.

He loved his country and never tired of speaking of her institutions, her Constitution, her traditions, and of the equality and opportunities of her citizens. He had faith in the common man, and loved his fellow man. His life was clean and unblemished. He had a nobility of mien and bearing which indicated the life he lived and the thoughts which filled his mind.

As we look back in retrospect and recall his noble birth, his student days, his struggles at the bar, his activities in civic life, his services to his country in times of war and peace, his unfailing kindness and courtesy, and his generous impulses, may we not say: "Here was indeed a man. He played well his part in every station, and nothing became his life better than his quitting of the stage."

He did not anticipate death, and up to 10 minutes of his passing away he expected to recover his health. The courage which had sustained him in life did not forsake him in death, for he quit the mortal shores of time and sailed for the distant scenes without repining.

"Friend, ahoy!
Farewell, farewell.
Greetings and help the echoes tell
Faint but eternal.
Friend, ahoy!"

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I sustained a peculiar relation to our late colleague, the Representative at Large from the State of Illinois, the Hon. HENRY R. RATHBONE. He resided in the tenth district, which I have the honor to represent, and we were of course both inhabitants of Illinois. He was therefore my constituent, as I was his. His popularity and high standing, not only in our congressional district, but in the entire State, were attested by the large vote of confidence given him in each succeeding election. His industry was indefatigable; his patriotism and devotion to duty unimpeachable. He loved his work in the Congress and probably impaired his health by his generous response to every call for the employment of his rare oratorical talent. His addresses on Lincoln were masterpieces, for which he was justly famed far and wide. He took a special interest in the District of Columbia, in which he was born of parents who were personal friends of the martyred President of the Civil War period. At the time of his death, Mr. RATHBONE was president of the Illinois State Society of the National Capital. This body had a special meeting, devoted to his memory, on November 23, 1928, at which a notable eulogy was pronounced upon our late colleague by another eloquent son of Illinois, the Hon. Theodore G. Risley, Solicitor for the Department of Labor. Under leave granted by the House, I extend these remarks by the insertion of that address:

ADDRESS ON THE LIFE AND PUBLIC SERVICE OF HENRY RIGGS RATHBONE, DELIVERED BEFORE THE ILLINOIS STATE SOCIETY, AT WASHINGTON, D. C., ON NOVEMBER 23, 1928, BY THEODORE G. RISLEY, OF MOUNT CARMEL, ILL.

By the death of HENRY RIGGS RATHBONE, which occurred on July 15 of this year, the Illinois State Society of Washington lost its distinguished president, the State of Illinois an eminent Member of Congress, and the Nation a faithful and patriotic statesman.

Mr. RATHBONE was born in Washington in 1870 and was known as the only Washington Representative in Congress. He was the sole Member of the House born in the city of Washington. He was always the friend of the District, and in every proper way sought to promote its development and beauty.

He was the son of Henry Reed Rathbone and Clara Harris Rathbone, who were with the Lincolns in their box at Ford's Theater on the night of the President's assassination. The story of this tragedy inculcated in young RATHBONE a profound reverence for the character of the illustrious emancipator.

Mr. RATHBONE was graduated from Yale University in 1892 and from the Albany Law School in 1893, and afterwards from the University of Wisconsin. He moved to Illinois, where he was soon admitted to the bar and had a successful career as a trial lawyer. In 1903 he was married to Laura Lucille Harney, of Oshkosh, Wis., who survives him.

In 1916 he was elected president of the Hamilton Club of Chicago.

As a Member of Congress he advocated the causes of prohibition and farm relief and was an earnest supporter of a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. He took an active interest in aviation and championed the bill honoring the Army fliers who circled the world in 1924. He contributed invaluable support in submitting to the States an amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting child labor.

He possessed, both by natural endowments and valuable experience, high qualifications for the performance of legislative duties. He was an indefatigable and painstaking student of economic, industrial, and social conditions; his knowledge of public affairs was extensive and unusually accurate, and he was illuminating and effective in the discussion of public questions. The character and importance of his legislative service to his State and his country were of a high order and he enjoyed the confidence and respect of his fellow legislators. After having served as Congressman at Large from the State of Illinois for three terms, he received the splendid tribute of a renomination for that important office which manifested the appreciation of the people of Illinois of his valuable public service.

A STUDENT OF LINCOLN

Mr. RATHBONE enjoyed a national reputation as an assiduous student of, and brilliant lecturer on, the life of Lincoln. He was the author of the bill which authorized the Government to purchase the priceless Oldroyd collection of Lincolniana and earnestly endeavored to have the old Ford's Theater established as a Lincoln museum.

He was clear in his convictions, unfaltering in his purposes, and fearless in the advocacy of his opinions. He was a patient investigator, and in the alluring field of research he found the keenest of pleasure. His local attachments were profound, but his mind was broad, his ideals elevated, and his views on public issues were continental in their scope.

His convictions were sincere and his opinions were usually well matured. The simplicity of his conduct, his kindliness, his common sense, and transparent honesty appealed to the people and enlarged the circle of his influence.

His understanding was comprehensive, his judgment clear, and his motives and actions were at all times controlled by reason and conscience. He never compromised to the prejudice of that which he believed to be right, nor indulged in sycophantic arts to win fleeting applause.

He studied public questions from every angle which appeared to him and discussed them with a lucidity and a cogency that was convincing, and his sense of discrimination was exquisite. His professional and political ethics were irreproachable.

SERVICES AS PRESIDENT OF THE ILLINOIS STATE SOCIETY

Mr. RATHBONE deeply appreciated his election as president of our society, and he sincerely felt it to be a genuine compliment, and particularly so because of his love for and loyalty to our great State. He had a zealous desire to foster the spirit of good will and promote the finer sentiments of social relationship among us and also to inspire in his fellow Illinoisans an ever-increasing devotion to the welfare of our great State and an enduring veneration for the men and women who, by unselfish sacrifices and with efficient hands and stout hearts, have contributed to her material success and moral and spiritual welfare.

HENRY RIGGS RATHBONE has "Passed beneath that low green tent Whose curtains never outward swing," but he has left behind the sweet incense of a cherished name.

To his beloved widow, at this time of her irreparable loss, we tender our deepest sympathy.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, during my 20-year service in the House of Representatives I had the pleasure and honor to serve with a great many splendid, sincere, and patriotic men.

The State of Illinois, which I am in part representing, has been extremely fortunate in giving to the Nation more than its share of such Representatives. Some are now still in their private capacity of service to their State and to the Nation, and many have gone to their reward and from whence no traveler returns.

Among the foremost of these men easily are: The former Speaker of the House of Representatives, "Uncle" Joe Cannon, who had attained, due to his energy, ability, courage, and his long service, a position second to none since the existence of our Government; James R. Mann; Martin B. Madden; Ben Caldwell; Martin B. Foster, who left behind them enviable records of achievements, and many others, but none of them were more devoted to their duties or possessed greater desire of being of service that our dear departed colleague, HENRY R. RATHBONE, whose main object in life was to serve his fellow man.

Born and raised in the Capital of the Nation, he seemed at all times to be desirous to give the very best that was in him to the Nation and to the Capital of the Nation.

And though of old Republican stock, he has shown at all times that independent spirit which frequently would have been embarrassing to less principled men. With him party lines were not as binding as the interest of the Nation. He not only preached but followed the precept "That he who serves his country the best serves his party the best."

Having known him before he entered the House of Representatives, I therefore watched his activities from the first day of his term, and though the State of Illinois has given to the Nation many capable, industrious, sincere Members, I do not know of anyone who was more devoted to his duties and more desirous to be of service than he.

It is to be regretted that he was torn from us prematurely and that he no longer will be seen hurrying or speeding from one committee room to another, endeavoring to fulfill his manifold duties and to comply with the hundreds of requests that came to him as a Member at Large of the great State of Illinois.

Mr. BUCKBEE. Mr. Speaker, HENRY RIGGS RATHBONE was a man that one can never forget—for he was a man of exceptional making. He was a man who was a man—a friend of all classes and of all races. His friends were numbered in hosts, and his passing was felt by all. The clay with which our Creator molded him was of the finest elements. First, it had durability and stamina, and yet, in spite of all its firmness, it contained an element of kindness; an element of friendliness for all. It was a clay presentable to all—dignitary and laborer alike. And HENRY RATHBONE was true to the last degree of his Maker's wish.

All his life he tried, and it can not be questioned for one moment that he did not succeed, to mold his life and deeds after that immortal one whose very name makes one stand in awe—none other than our everlasting patriot, Abraham Lincoln. Time and time again was noticed the semblance of his deeds and actions to those of Lincoln.

His ability as an orator was recognized—and it could not but be so—wherever he was heard. His imposing figure, his eloquent flow of words, and his expressive manner are qualities given to very few mortals. And the appreciative factor of all this—and it is a factor that will long be remembered—is that always he used his gifts for the betterment of mankind. Often did the Halls of Congress ring with his inspiring words, as he lent himself to the defense of a measure that he felt was for the good of his friends—his countrymen.

And so it is with sadness that I write in memory of the man; the man whom I, and everyone else, shall remember until we too are swept away. But perhaps the stately words of the poet can express my sentiments in tones more eloquent, and with a deeper ring—

The color of the ground was in him, the red earth,
The smack and tang of elemental things.
The rectitude and patience of the cliff;
And when he fell in the whirlwind, he went down
As when a lordly cedar, green with boughs,
Goes down with a great shout upon the hills,
And leaves a lonesome place against the sky.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to add my word of appreciation of the life and work of my friend and colleague HENRY RIGGS RATHBONE. The people of Illinois were proud of him. They had a pride in his devotion to duty. They were proud of his untiring industry and of his eloquence of speech.

He was a picturesque figure here in Washington, where he was born and where so much of dramatic and tragic interest touched intimately the history of his family. The wonderful energy of his tall Lincolnian body and the alertness of his well-trained mind were constantly at the service of his people and his country.

Mr. RATHBONE was a lawyer of profound learning, making him wise in council, and his powerful eloquence made him an effective and successful advocate. In his years of service as a statesman he was true to his first love, the law, and he practiced his profession to the end.

With his manifold duties as a statesman and as a lawyer, somehow he found time to be of service in other ways. He was a teacher in the National University Law School and a lecturer at the Howard University, and in these capacities he instilled in the minds of the young students at both institutions his own inborn high conceptions of patriotism, devotion to duty, and a will to service.

His service in these two institutions has left undying impressions upon the lives of the young lawyers and the young colored students attending them.

In Illinois he was a unique figure. Tall, almost gaunt, strikingly good looking in a rough way, he was a constant and persistent and untiring visitor among our people.

I doubt if there was ever a public man in that State who was personally known by more people than was Mr. RATHBONE.

Everyone said they knew HENRY RATHBONE. This was because he loved people and he liked to meet them, liked to meet lots of them and often. And when he did meet people his friendly smile and friendly words and friendly handshake won their hearts and made them his friends.

I remember having occasion to go to Pontiac, one of the large towns in my district, early one Sunday morning, and when I arrived, one of the firse persons I met was my friend Henry.

He told me he was going to Forrest, Chattsworth, and Fairbury that day and then was going to speak in the Methodist Church at Pontiac at night. I told a friend about this and I told him that Henry would see a lot of good men and women in each of these towns and my final remark was, "If RATHBONE completes a visit in four good-sized towns on Sunday, what could he do on a week day."

His service in Congress was especially acceptable to three classes of people—to farmers, to union labor, and to the colored race.

His great heart beat in sympathy with these, his constituents, and in his work here he never failed them.

His untimely death leaves an aching void in the hearts of the people of Illinois, and while all vacant places, it seems, can be filled, and are, still his place in the councils of the Nation will be hard to fill.

HENRY RATHBONE was of such a kindly disposition among his associates and he looked upon them with such a friendly eye that I must say that he, in passing, would have it said of him:

But I would like to have my story told
By smiling friends with whom I've shared the way;
Who, thinking of me, nod their heads and say
His heart was warm when other hearts were cold.

LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM, a Representative in Congress from the fourteenth congressional district of Massachusetts, died August 23, 1928. That the nature of the loss suffered by the House, by the Commonwealth he in part represented, and by the country he so usefully served may be better understood, and that his memory may be better perpetuated, a record of his life should precede the tributes paid to him by his colleagues.

The latest learning tells us that every man's life began untold æons before he was born. When he comes into the world he is made up of an almost infinite number of contributions from ancestors. These we can not trace back even to the rivulets, much less to the springs. Only when the joining rivulets become streams do they have significance we can interpret.

In this instance enlightenment begins with a group of ancestors who were among the men and women finding a new home on the shores of Massachusetts Bay 300 years ago. He who bore the name of Frothingham came with the fleet of Gov. John Winthrop to Salem and then to Charlestown, where through many years the name was familiar. Four others were of the Pilgrims, who a decade earlier had landed on Plymouth Rock. Also there were the Rev. John Cotton and the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, clergymen eminent in the time when clergymen were dominant in Massachusetts.

From such stock, blended of Pilgrim and Puritan, came a family that ever since has been conspicuous for its influence on the life of the old Commonwealth. It furnished preachers who notably filled important pulpits; soldiers who in the Indian wars, the War of Independence, nad the wars of our own period held commissions attesting both capacity and patriotism; scholars who made valuable contribution to the treasure of literature; jurists who are remembered for their learning and sagacity.

What they did, however, is to us here of consequence only as revealing what they were—men of serious purposes and high ideals, men of integrity, men of courage, men of ability, men whose aim in life was to serve. Inevitably of such in his turn was LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM.

Born in Boston July 13, 1871, his earlier years followed the course usual in the case of Boston boys from families accustomed to look upon adequate education as the necessary foundation for the most useful life. From the public schools he went first to the Roxbury Latin and then to Adams Academy in Quincy, institutions long notable for thorough training of the mind, and then to Harvard College. Though diligent with his books, he was not to be best remembered for scholarly achievement, but rather by the physical faculties with which he had been remarkably endowed. He was one of the rare youths having that combination of muscle, nerves, and judgment which achieves preeminence in every form of bodily competition. This stood him in good stead to his latest years, as may be attested by his associates here who vied with him in the forms of outdoor contest suitable for the mature. In his college days it secured for him the prizes of successful leadership, and also its training against the needs of struggle in the various conflicts of afterlife.

Furthermore, with the aid of other qualities it helped win for him that most subtle of achievements—popularity. Athletic prowess by itself can not secure this. Popularity eludes mental endowment. It can not be bought. It can not be earned. In its purest aspect it can not be cultivated. It springs from qualities that defy analysis. Just why LOUIS FROTHINGHAM was liked, often beloved, by those who came within the circle of his acquaintance no man can tell. We know only the fact.

After graduating from college and then from the law school he turned his thoughts to broader fields of service than any one profession can give. Although admitted to the bar and at times afterwards practicing the law, the opportunities of public life were more attractive. Probably his interest therein was incerased by what he observed while acting for a time as secretary to a Massachusetts Member of Congress. Then his outlook was broadened by a share in the Spanish War. He had joined the Massachusetts Militia and naturally sought war service, which he found as an officer of marines on the U. S. S. Yankee.

Not long after returning, he was able to begin mounting the political ladder, being elected to the general court from the Back Bay district of Boston in 1900. In the next three years steadily increasing responsibilities were intrusted to him, and then by the house of 1904 he was chosen speaker. This was because apart from personal popularity he had convinced his associates that he was cautious, prudent, well-balanced, earnest, sincere, and of complete integrity.

The speakership of the Massachusetts House means something in Massachusetts. Unhampered by the constitutional shackles that minimize the opportunities for service in the legislatures of most of the other States, the general court of the old Bay State still has long sessions, gives an answer to every citizen with a grievance, maintains its leadership in the careful enactment of wise statutes for the public welfare. The speaker can not rule there, but he may guide if he will, and the young speaker from Boston was a wise and skillful guide. Commanding complete respect, trusted as absolutely fair, efficient as a presiding officer, he could have held the position long, but a high sense of duty led him to retire after two years upon the urgent request of party associates that he become a candidate for the mayoralty of the city of Boston. That office seemed to his friends to need him the more, but the electorate thought otherwise, and for a time it looked as if the door to further opportunity in public service was closed.

Such was not to be long the case. Everybody felt that his forsaking the speakership to lead a forlorn hope was a sacrifice not to be forgotten, and so when his friends presented him as a candidate for lieutenant governor in 1908 he started with a deserved advantage not to be overcome, won the nomination with a handsome margin, and then the election.

In our State it is almost a habit to promote the lieutenant governor. After his apprenticeship of three years in the subordinate position, Mr. FROTHINGHAM would undoubtedly have been so promoted, had it not been for the fact that the governor, of opposite party and a candidate for reelection, was unusually skilled in holding the public favor, so that once more it looked as if public life were ended.

Then came an interval of service in other fields. As an overseer of Harvard—by the way, the youngest man to be elected such—he had the chance to serve the university by which he was so highly regarded. Certain lectures he there delivered were elaborated into an excellent book on the constitution and government of Massachusetts. Two hospitals benefited by his counsel as a trustee, and also he became president of a savings bank, which in Massachusetts is a philanthropic institution.

Our entry into the World War gave fresh chance to put his training and experience at the command of his country. Besides receiving a commission as major in the Regular Army, he was able to be of generous help to the Massachusetts men on the other side of the water, for he went across as a member of a State commission to visit the Massachusetts soldiers at the front, and with his wife opened a home in Paris where the boys on leave could find friendly companionship and encouragement.

After the war he returned to the home in North Easton to which he had removed from Boston upon his marriage in 1916. There, amid beautiful surroundings, he was able to gratify his love for nature and to enjoy her bounties. The rose garden became his particular pride. You may trust the man to whom such things bring unalloyed happiness.

Again public life drew him. In 1920 he won the nomination and election to represent the fourteenth Massachusetts district in the National House. So well did he thenceforth perform the duties of a Representative that he could have come back here indefinitely. He commanded the complete respect and good will of his district. For its interest he worked faithfully.

In the House he was gradually winning that confidence which eventually brings important influence. Not a frequent speaker, he was listened to when he took the floor, for it was felt he would say only that which would help. His judgments in the committee room deserved and won attention. Had he been spared for lengthier service he would in time have reached high place in the councils of the Nation.

That he should have been cut off just when life held out such promise is one of the mysteries that pass finite understanding. He seemed to have in perfection the sound mind in the sound body. In all things he was temperate. There was no man among us whom at the close of the previous session we should have more confidently expected to greet when we met here again. Yet now nothing remains for us save to treasure his memory and be thankful that he was our friend.

My colleagues will appraise his character. I must not too much forestall them, but the friendship and association of a quarter of a century, through much of which we worked together, will not let me conclude without attempting to set forth in a few words the reasons why, to my mind, he was such a valuable servant of his fellow man and why his death was such a loss.

He had in unusual degree the kindly spirit, a sympathetic interest in those with whom he came in touch, the wish to make others happy. Though modest almost to shyness, he could on occasion be outspoken and firm. Behind his diffidence was real courage. He was high-minded, clean, sincere. Utterly devoid of affectation, lacking wholly in self-conceit, without pride of place, respecting himself and therefore respecting others, upright and honorable, the world was the better because he lived.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the citizens of the fourteenth congressional district of Massachusetts have conferred upon me the very great honor of intrusting to my hand the torch held high in recent years by your former colleague, my distinguished predecessor, whose memory we honor to-day, LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM.

It was my privilege to know him first as the popular graduate of my alma mater, the close friend of many of my friends, who had risen to the position of Lieutenant Governor of Massachusetts and later in Treasury days as the successful Representative of my congressional district. Recent experience, however, has afforded an insight into the ideals which governed him in life and an appreciation of the position which he held in the affections of his constituents, which will always abide.

LOUIS FROTHINGHAM devoted his life to public service. He believed that life held no greater opportunity for one in his position than that of serving those about him. His life itself speaks more eloquently than words of his nobility of character, his high public purpose, and his unswerving adherence to whatever course he believed to be honorable and right. As soldier, legislator, speaker of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, lieutenant governor, and a Member of the Congress of the United States he served his State and Nation with distinction and with fidelity and won the respect of all with whom he came in contact.

His also was the touchstone of friendship. His sincerity and ready sympathy were apparent to all. Recalled from duties overseas immediately after his death to engage in an active campaign for the position which had been his by common accord, it was inevitable that I should sense at close range the sentiment throughout his congressional district. I can truly say that LOUIS FROTHINGHAM was beloved by his constituents. Wherever I went and among people of every walk in life I found the same expression of genuine affection for him. I hope sincerely that he appreciated how widespread this feeling was, for to me it seems about the greatest reward that could come to one in his position.

Hundreds of letters received after his death by his devoted widow afford striking evidence of the light in which he was held by a host of friends and admirers. State and Nation are the better for the life which he led. The torch should burn more brightly in the memory of the ideals which guided him to the place won in the hearts of those he served.

The following tribute was written at the time of his death by a friend of years standing:

LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM, although in politics for many years, was not a politician, as the term goes, yet in many political ways he was adroit. Had he been given the faculty for "mixing" he would have been irresistible. It would have enhanced his natural charm of manner, the kindliness and courtesy which were evidences of his breeding. It took more than a casual acquaintanceship to understand him and to know his sterling qualities.

Shy and diffident he ignored, as against his nature, to take advantage of many opportunities for keeping in the public eye. What he accomplished he did without any appeal to the gallery. He never made a promise he could not keep, and constituents found that it was his habit to minimize even big things he had done, whether for them or the district. He believed in party regularity, and he had enough political acumen to know that legislation is best accomplished by orderly process and not speeches.

When he talked in Congress he was usually very brief, and he wasted no words and got into no acrimonious discussions. He always held that an opponent was entitled to his views, a spirit of fair play which he manifested in all his contacts.

One of his heroes, and also a close friend, was the late Theodore Roosevelt, and this friendship remained unbroken, even though Mr. FROTHINGHAM did not bolt the party in the Progressive movement.

Rugged honesty influenced his every act. Not even political expediency would make him deviate a hair's breadth from the honorable and upright course. He chose deliberately, on leaving college, to go into public service, believing that he owed it to all the people to spend his time usefully, as all of his illustrious and talented family have done. Patriotism, of a sort this was, the same patriotism which sent him into the Spanish-American War, which saw him lieutenant colonel in the Massachusetts State Guard, and then major in the Regular Army in the World War, and also as a member of a Massachusetts commission who braved the dangers of front-line trenches to look after the comfort of Massachusetts troops.

He could have had a life of ease and pleasure, but he chose to busy himself with worth-while things. He could have attained far greater popularity by joining in the hue and cry for popular measures, but chose to work quietly, and by orderly process, for them. He could have capitalized his knowledge and learning, his friendships, and his associations for political advancement, but would not compromise his natural self.

It took a long time to finally know LOUIS FROTHINGHAM, and even then the revelation of his character brought constant surprises to find him so firm and inflexible for the right.

To know him was to be profoundly thankful that there are such men of high character and lofty purpose in political life; to be proud and pleased on penetrating the mask of modesty and diffidence to discover so many fine and noble traits.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the name of LOUIS A. FROTHINGHAM is secure in the annals of Massachusetts and will take rank with many of those men who have made our State renowned. Reference to them by name need not be recorded, as many of them will come at once to mind. We are proud that, not only at the present time but throughout the life of the Nation, Massachusetts has contributed its share of men deserving of the honored titles of American citizens and leaders in the affairs of the country.

Others to-day will describe our late colleague's accomplishments as a public servant. I wish only to refer to his personal qualities and my association with him.

Among various types and kinds of men whom I have known, certain outstanding characteristics of Mr. FROTHINGHAM deserve mention. Modesty and sincerity are virtues which everyone would possess. The degree to which they predominated in his life merit our emulation. No matter whether in work or play, that which he did was splendidly done; that which he did with skill and accuracy he would ascribe to chance. He always praised the abilities of others and deprecated his own, although it was always apparent that his success was due not to chance but to ability.

Representative FROTHINGHAM was a man of the very highest ideals of citizenship. His own character was the best evidence of his sincerity of purpose. LOUIS FROTHINGHAM was never known to stoop to underhanded means to accomplish an end. He trod the straight path of honorable accomplishment.

My friendship with him extended over a quarter of a century, during all of which time he held the highest respect and esteem of his associates, due to the constant application of the sterling qualities which I have mentioned. Together with one other Member of the present congressional delegation, who will speak more at length than I, we were associates in the legislature in 1904, when he first was elected speaker, a position which he filled with distinction and credit.

Through political fortunes he was in and out of office in State politics until the beginning of his congressional career. A few years make rapid changes. I happened to be with him when, as a candidate for Governor of Massachusetts, militant advocates of women's suffrage surprised us by an all-day heckling campaign. Our candidate never showed that he was provoked or failed to extend to the women following him from town to town throughout the Berkshire Hills the utmost courtesy and respect. His conduct that day was an evidence of his even temper and modest bearing.

During his service in Congress Mr. FROTHINGHAM displayed the same characteristics he had shown during his early political career in Massachusetts. Seldom taking the floor, his occasional speeches were always received with attention by his colleagues and his arguments indicated his interest in the subjects under discussion, as well as his knowledge of details.

His conception of the obligation of citizenship was always apparent. It was not confined to holding positions of honor in civil life, as he twice volunteered to serve under arms, first in the Spanish War and later in the World War.

We are proud of our association with him and of the example of his character and high type of manhood. His name will take high rank in the annals of Massachusetts public life as a man worthy of its best traditions.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, my first acquaintance with LOUIS FROTHINGHAM dates back to the time when we entered Harvard College as freshmen in the autumn of 1889. Although he did not neglect, as did so many sons of well-to-do parents, the intellectual side of college life, at the same time he took an active interest in athletics. As a second baseman he had few if any equals in college baseball and was chosen captain of the varsity team. Under his leadership, in our senior year, Harvard won an unbroken series of victories, and, in consequence, he became one of the best known and popular men not only of his class but of the entire college.

LOUIS FROTHINGHAM'S popularity with his classmates was not merely the transitory popularity of the successful athlete but was based on something much more substantial and enduring. He always played clean baseball and throughout his college and law-school career he lived a clean life. Moreover, he was always modest and unassuming and thoroughly democratic in the true sense of the word, so that his classmates not only admired and respected him for his character and attainments, but they entertained for him a real affection.

Upon his graduation from the Harvard Law School in 1896 he was admitted to the bar and in 1901 was chosen one of the members of the Massachusetts House of Representatives from the city of Boston, where he served with distinguished ability for four terms, the last two terms as speaker. From the speakership he was promoted to the office of lieutenant governor, which he filled with distinction for three terms.

I did not have the same good fortune as my colleague, Mr. LUCE, of serving with our dear departed friend in the Massachusetts Legislature, as my service in that body preceded his. In common with his other classmates, however, I followed his political career as well as his service in the Spanish-American War and the World War with intense interest and pride.

We were all delighted when he was chosen an overseer of Harvard College, to which office he was reelected by the alumni as many times as the rules permitted. He always entertained an abiding affection for his alma mater, and his addresses at the yearly reunions of the class of '93, in which he told us about the progress of the university as a result of his knowledge as a member of the board of overseers, were among the outstanding features of these gatherings.

On the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of our graduation from college he and his charming wife entertained the members of the class of 1893 at their beautiful home at North Easton, Mass. They repeated their generous hospitality five years later on our thirtieth anniversary. On the latter occasion the wives and children of the members of the class were invited, and there was a goodly company gathered together on that beautiful estate from all parts of the country, and none of those present on that delightful occasion will ever forget the gracious hospitality and especially the kindly greeting given to each guest, young and old, by the host and hostess.

At the presidential election of 1920, LOUIS FROTHINGHAM was urged by the leaders of his own party to be a candidate for Congress from the fourteenth district, which for four successive elections had chosen a member of the opposition party to that important office. He finally consented to run and was triumphantly elected to the Sixty-seventh Congress, and reelected to the Sixty-eighth, Sixty-ninth, and Seventieth Congresses, and would have been returned to the Seventy-first Congress but for his untimely death last summer.

As in the Massachusetts Legislature, so here in this great assembly of the Nation's Representatives, LOUIS FROTHINGHAM was respected, esteemed, and loved by all his colleagues. His was a life of clean living and high thinking. It could be truthfully said of him that he was one who not only never intentionally did anything wrong but who never thought anything wrong. His face always retained its boyish expression. He never seemed to grow old or to lose his youthful enthusiasm for the highest ideals. He abhorred the sordid selfishness which is constantly seeking to control public opinion and to influence legislation for its own aggrandizement. He regarded political office as an opportunity for unselfish service to the community, the State, and the Nation, and he stood steadfastly for what he thought was right regardless of possible consequences to his own personal fortunes.

Like his distinguished brother, Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, who was for more than a generation an inspiring prophet of righteousness, his departure from our midst came quickly and unexpectedly, "in the twinkling of an eye" but, like his brother, our dear friend and colleague was ready to go. To all his relatives and to his host of friends his going came as a great shock, particularly to his wife, to whom as well as to all his family, goes our most heartfelt sympathy. As one who has known and loved him these many years, I can hardly realize that he has left us. In the fullness of an abiding faith, however, I know that he has only passed over the river, which we all must cross, a little ahead of the rest of us, to take up his abode in that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the name "politician" unfortunately does not always bring to mind the finest type of citizenship. It does not always connote the patriot who spends his life disinterestedly in the service of his country. But that was the kind of politician that we had the privilege of knowing in LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM. If we were blessed in our public life with more men of his character and of his ideals and standards the profession of politics would be in far better repute. Our lamented colleague gave the whole span of his mature life, save for two periods when the country was at war and he offered himself as a volunteer in the military forces, to the business of government in the best and the most admirable sense of that phrase. He helped to raise the respect in which a political career is regarded in the thoughts of all who knew him.

College bred, trained in the law, of independent income, secure in his position, with a wide and influential acquaintance, he might easily have followed a comfortable and remunerative life in the pursuit of law or business. He deliberately chose, however, the rough and uneven road of politics with its harsh struggles, its inevitable rebuffs, its vulnerability to misunderstanding and abuse. One can recall many men who have spent their lives in public office, but one can recall few comparable to LOUIS FROTHINGHAM in unselfishness of ambition, in loyalty to convictions, in unswerving effort to have his life count for what he thought was right and true.

LOUIS FROTHINGHAM was essentially a likable man, not merely genial and gracious in manner but really friendly at heart. Though not devoid of personal ambition, he was always considerate and generous in appreciation of others. He never tried to elbow his way ahead of them. He played fair with his associates and rivals in the political field, just as he had with his team mates and opponents on the gridiron or diamond in his student days. He practiced no subterfuges. He knew no tricks. He was a good sportsman all the way through. He was sincere and direct and without camouflage or evasion. He never trimmed the pattern of his speech to win popular support. He sought no favors by disingenuous means. He tried to find the truth about public questions open-mindedly and he had a rare way of making alignments without regard to personal political advantage or to the favoring opinion of those at home.

His training for Congress was such as is only granted to few. For ancestry there were generations of forbears distinguished in the law, the Christian ministry, and philanthropy. For academic background there was Harvard College and the Law School, from both of which he had graduated and with which his affiliations ever remained close. He had lectured in the college for a time on State and city government, and during 18 years he was a member of the university board of overseers. His political preparation had been varied and thorough. Before coming to Congress he had served six years in the Massachusetts Legislature, including two years as speaker, and after that as lieutenant governor of the Commonwealth. He was peculiarly fitted to render helpful aid to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which he became a member, because his was the remarkable experience of having served successfully in the Marine Corps, the State Guard, and the United States Army.

With such a character and such a training it was but natural that the opinions expressed by Congressman FROTHINGHAM were received with respect and carried weight in the committee and on the floor of the House. During the four terms which he spent here he had come to exert more and more of an influence in Congress, and he had won year by year ever-increasing popularity at home which not only ensured his tenure of office for as long a time as he might choose but gave promise of eventual advancement. He seemed to be on the threshold of his most fruitful years and destined to a long and progressive career in American public life.

On the 23d of August, last year, abruptly and without warning, death laid its hand upon his shoulder and led him away. At the very time when chapters of greater purport seemed about to be written, the book of his life was closed. The sudden ending of LOUIS FROTHINGHAM'S promising career is a source of sorrow to every Member of this body. The House of Representatives lost an able Member held in high and growing esteem, and we, his former colleagues, greatly mourn the passing of a sterling character and separation from a generous, loyal, and delightful friend.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any length on the life and public achievements of our late distinguished colleague. These have been described eloquently in previous tributes which have to-day been paid to his memory. Yet I would express my sincere admiration for the character of LOUIS A. FROTHINGHAM, my friend and neighbor, for he represented a congressional district in part adjacent to my own. On occasions our official problems overlapped, and I was thus able to become personally familiar with the exceptional service which he was daily rendering to his constituents in his quiet, efficient way, and to understand one of the many reasons why he was four times elected to the House by great and ever-increasing majorities.

He was in truth a man who embodied the finest traditions of Massachusetts. He came of honorable and honored lineage. He had received the best that America had to offer in scholastic education and profited by it. He was polished; a gentleman in every sense; a man of no inconsiderable means, yet withal, unfailingly simple, modest, and a sincere friend to all who merited friendship or needed assistance. His true simplicity was also shown in his great love of nature. Possibly some of you visited his wonderful rose gardens, in which he took so much pleasure, and which he shared so generously with all his friends.

He gave of his best to the State and Nation because of an honest desire to devote his special talents to the public service, and not—I know that you will agree—with any thought of personal glorification. Such an idea would have been wholly inconsistent with his life and character, and the modesty with which he wore the honors bestowed upon him at home and abroad further proves it.

Every State, like every nation, seems to have a special type which exemplifies its own best characteristics and ideals. It is my feeling that LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM—what stirring historical memories those last two names bring to our minds—was typical of Massachusetts' finest traditions. To some, who knew him little, he may have seemed like an American aristocrat and conservative, but his quiet reserve cloaked a soul dedicated to the same ideals as those which had actuated his ancestors, who struggled for justice and liberty, both political and religious. Like St. Paul he merely believed in "proving all things and holding fast to the good." His influence was great. His example one which all of us might well have followed consistently.

LOUIS FROTHINGHAM was taken from us suddenly in the prime of a life, rich in heritage and intellectual training, and ripe in wide experience. Such a one the State and Nation could ill afford to lose, especially at an age when many more years of worth while service in the public weal might have been expected of him. Yet regrets of this nature and the sense of personal loss are in part compensated by the recollection of his already notable record as a citizen, soldier, and statesman and by the example which he left for others to follow.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, once again the gaunt hand of death has taken from us a beloved and respected colleague. Indeed, sir, the necrological record of this body for this Congress is hardly believable.

To-day we are gathered to commemorate the memory of a distinguished son of Massachusetts, one whom we were all proud to call a friend.

LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM, scholar, soldier, and statesman, was born in Jamaica Plain, Mass., July 13, 1871. Born amid affluence and ease, the progeny of an old and respected Bay State family, yet he labored incessantly and gave freely of his time and energy to his country. Imbued with patriotism and always interested in the military, he joined the marines and served with that body as a second lieutenant during the Spanish-American War. Upon his return to civil life he took an active interest in politics and in 1901 was elected a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives. He served in that body for five years, the last two as speaker. From 1909 to 1911 he served the Commonwealth zealously and well as lieutenant governor. When the World War came upon us he again joined the colors, serving as a major in the United States Army. Upon his discharge from the Army, he resumed his activity in politics, and in 1920 was elected to Congress and served continuously in this body until his untimely and sudden death.

Mr. Speaker, I knew Mr. FROTHINGHAM first in 1902, when we both served in the Massachusetts House of Representatives. I grew not only to like him but he had my respect, for to him—

> It was not the loss of a battle that counts,
> But how did you fight, and why?

He had a charming personality, always good natured, a keen lover of sports, and a real student of government. Above all things he was a gentleman of the highest order. To know him was to love him. Our friendship remained unbroken until his death. To me his passing was not only a public loss but a personal sorrow.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. LOUIS A. FROTHINGHAM the Commonwealth of Massachusetts suffered the loss of one of her most distinguished and best-loved sons, and the Nation was deprived of one of its most patriotic and useful servants. Born in Massachusetts, a descendant of a long line of sturdy American stock, he loved the lofty traditions and splendid institutions of his native State, and all his life labored with unflagging zeal for their perpetuation.

A lawyer by profession, he honored and adorned the bar. Ardent desire for public service early led him into the field of politics, where special talent for legislative work soon raised him to the front rank. His remarkable service while a member of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, where he established himself as a sound, progressive, highly capable legislator, led to his quick promotion to the speakership of that important body. Later he rose to the high office of lieutenant governor of his State, serving in that capacity with renewed honor and distinction.

He served his country valiantly and devotedly in both the Spanish-American War and the World War. Having himself been a soldier, he brought to Congress an intimate knowledge of the needs of the soldier. Thus he became here the loyal friend and defender of the veteran and his family, to whose interests he was ever keenly alive. In fact, here in Congress and throughout his long public career he was always the friend and defender of every good and just cause.

He never put party above principle or State or country. He was respected and beloved by men of all parties. As a legislator, as a soldier, as a man, he served humanity and loved to serve. He served humanity because he believed in humanity and considered every man his brother. He had a positive genius for friendship and his friends were legion.

His nature was calm, positive, but not combative. He was not combative because he scorned to wound or offend. He never, I think, had an enemy of his own making. He valued the respect and good will of his fellow men above all earthly rewards.

He was generous and kindly. He was dignifiedly modest; unseemly pride never had sullied his refined sensibilities. He was a high-minded, idealistic, exemplary Christian, whose unnumbered works of simple mercy and unheralded charity will constitute a monument to bless and perpetuate his name. He was the soul of honor. He could not stoop to do a mean thing; he never harbored a mean thought, for he was above all things else a gentleman, a cultured knight sans peur et sans reproche.

It was my rare privilege to know LOUIS A. FROTHINGHAM as a friend for over a generation and a half. "And none knew him but to love." To me his untimely taking off in the prime of his life and at the height of his usefulness came as a distinct personal loss. His gentle spirit is in the eternal realms of his Creator; on earth his memory still lives fragrant, sweet, inspiring. Requiescat in pace!

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is with infinite sadness that I pay a brief tribute to a distinguished colleague and esteemed friend of 20 years.

The suddenness of his death came as a great shock. One week before he died I passed a pleasant day in his company. He was in good health and in his usual happy spirits. When the message came of his death it was almost unbelievable. It emphasized the uncertainty of life.

Well do I recall my first acquaintance with LOUIS FROTHINGHAM. It was in 1908, when as a successful candidate for lieutenant governor he was an inspiration to all the young Republicans of the old Bay State. A political revolution prevented what would ordinarily have been a certain procession to the governorship and higher honors.

To his eternal credit he accepted the unexpected twist of fate with the same equanimity with which he accepted the high honors heaped upon him in his young manhood. His greatness in defeat won for him the admiration of his party and his host of friends. Later when his party wished to reclaim the fourteenth district, it instinctively turned to him. The election followed, and no better evidence of the splendid service he rendered in Congress can be offered than in the constantly increasing pluralities with which he was returned to office.

LOUIS FROTHINGHAM stood out as an honest, capable, conscientious public servant. He never sought the glare of the spotlight. He was content to do his duty as his conscience dictated in a modest, efficient manner.

If one was to single out his predominating personal characteristics, it would be to name his sweetness of character and loyalty to his friends. These attributes, generally appreciated, won the firm friendship of all who came into contact with him. No man was blessed with firmer friendships than he.

Massachusetts mourns the loss of a distinguished and beloved son. We have all lost a true and loyal friend. He has gone to his reward. His place in the hereafter is assured. His inspiring character and worthy deeds will live in the fond and enduring memory of his friends, and his splendid life of achievements will assure him a home of happiness in the great eternity beyond.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, we know that LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM passed to the Great Beyond last August; all that could die has gone. But his gracious, friendly, helpful spirit lives on and can never cease.

Born to wealth and a life of ease, LOUIS ADAMS FROTHINGHAM chose the harder way of toil for others. Gentleman by birth and tradition, in every way he lived up to the true meaning of that word. He could not do an ungentlemanly thing; he could not perform a mean act. I have never heard him utter an unkind word. He never espoused an unworthy cause. With his intense loyalty to his friends and great loyalty to his ideals, he enriched his own life in enriching the lives of others. His extremely active and successful life left him singularly unspoiled, singularly gentle. The shots of political battles and the struggles of professional life left upon him no marks of bitterness.

His friends were legion and included the most exalted in the land and the humblest, and all took pride in his friendship. His oldest friends tell me that during his entire life rich and poor sought his counsel, and no friend in trouble ever came empty handed away.

As soldier, lawyer, statesman, and scholar, he gave to each and every place his best. His life was all too short. His brilliant career ended all too soon, but he died as he lived, in service. He was ready to give his life for his country in war; instead he died in the service of his country at peace.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker, when the Grim Reaper came among us and cut down, in the prime of his life, our beloved colleague, LOUIS FROTHINGHAM, it was very hard for us to understand. Strong, vigorous, and athletic, it seemed impossible for him of all men to be stricken. We feel his loss greatly.

LOUIS FROTHINGHAM came to Congress with a splendid background of public service in his home State of Massachusetts. He had also, on the two occasions of the Spanish-American War and the World War, shown his patriotism and love of country by entering its military service.

He was admirably fitted by temperament, training, and experience, to be a successful Member of the National Legislature. His service in this body was marked by high idealism, combined with sound judgment. He performed his duties faithfully, diligently, and most conscientiously. His personality inspired affection. He was beloved by all those who knew him well.

The outstanding trait of LOUIS FROTHINGHAM was his character itself. He was essentially a man of character. No one could imagine his doing anything, either personally or legislatively, that would seem to deviate in the slightest degree from the highest ethical standards. He abhorred practices below par in others. He was at all times so manly, so straightforward.

His loyalty and devotion to his family and his friends was outstanding. He embodied the best traits of a New England environment. He personified the highest type of a New England gentleman.

His loss to his State and to the Nation is irreparably great. His loss to his friends and to his family is beyond expression.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, it was with very real grief and a sense of personal loss that I learned of the unexpected and sudden passing from this world of my late friend and colleague in Congress, Hon. LOUIS A. FROTHINGHAM. To eulogize him properly is a task beyond the capabilities of my poor power of speech. Enough to say that to us who knew him through intimate daily intercourse no eulogy is necessary to fix him firmly in our minds and memories. I believe it would be difficult to forget—for me, at least—the kind, quiet gentleman, so unfailingly cordial in the course of the many times our duties in Congress as members of the same State delegation have brought us together, both at work and recreation. Since my first coming to Congress, and even before that time, when I met him in Worcester, Mass., at the State convention of the American Legion, I felt that here was one whom I could call a friend and whom I would not hesitate to call on whenever I needed advice or information. Always he was glad to extend to me as a fellow member of his delegation bits of knowledge or data which he believed might be of help to me, and I never hesitated to avail myself of this privilege. I recall with pleasure and pride that on the day when I first took my seat in Congress that Congressman FROTHINGHAM came to me from the Republican side of the House and in his quiet, sincere way shook hands with me and wished me the best of good luck during my coming term. It will seem strange to me now to feel that I shall not see his familiar face nodding its friendly greeting to me.

I have had much admiration for the fine character of Congressman FROTHINGHAM, and always have enjoyed and admired his wonderful command of English, the ease and fluency of his diction, his utter lack of pretense, and quiet sense of humor.

There is not much that can be said. Only that our friend is gone, and although new faces will come, as in the course of nature they must, and others will nod their greeting, just as LOUIS FROTHINGHAM used to, nevertheless I know that there will be a pleasant memory to many of us, and life will be just a little fuller to us for having known a fine and sincere gentleman. After all, when, as one by one we pass on, there is nothing much more we can hope to leave behind us, and how wonderful to leave a memory which brings a thought of affection and admiration to those who knew us. And this our friend, whom I am happy to have called my friend, has done.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I present for the RECORD the resolutions adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives as a mark of respect to our late colleague and fellow committee member, Hon. LOUIS A. FROTHINGHAM:

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God, in His mysterious yet wise providence, to call from our midst our esteemed colleague, Hon. LOUIS A. FROTHINGHAM, we, the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, in expressing our sorrow at the loss of one who took an active part in the deliberation of this committee: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the death of Mr. FROTHINGHAM each member of the committee has all the sense of loss of a personal friend; and be it further

Resolved, That in the death of Mr. FROTHINGHAM the Congress has lost a Member, straightforward, courageous, and honest in his views; and his district a Representative who truly voiced the patriotism and devotion to the principles of representative government founded by the forefathers; and be it further

Resolved, That we sympathize with the bereaved family in their hour of sorrow; and be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread on the minutes of the committee, be made a part of the memorial service to our deceased colleague, and a copy be transmitted to the family.

JOHN M. MORIN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs.

THOMAS LEWIS RUBEY

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I knew intimately THOMAS L. RUBEY for more than a quarter of a century. I served with him in the Senate of Missouri, over which body he presided as president pro tempore, and later as lieutenant governor with credit to himself and his high office.

He was elected to Congress from the sixteenth district of Missouri in November, 1910, and served continuously until his death on November 2, 1928, except for two years following what is known as the landslide of 1920 which retired so many of his Democratic colleagues. Mr. RUBEY represented the district so long represented by "Silver" Dick Bland, who on many ballots was the leading candidate for President at the Democratic convention in Chicago in the year 1896, when Mr. Bryan was nominated.

During all of his service in Congress Mr. RUBEY was a prominent member of the Committee on Agriculture. He served his district with honor and distinguished credit. He was loved by his constituents as few men have been. No purer or better man ever came to Congress from any district than this industrious Representative, who served his constituents with a singular devotion to duty and with an ever-present desire to represent the best thought and best interests of his outstanding agricultural district. He lived a good life. He discharged every duty. He wronged no man. He was just to all. He loved his friends, his home, his State, and his country. He followed the dictates of his own conscience in every action after diligent study on every question. He voted on matters of legislation with a stubborn desire to cast a correct vote in the interest of those whose Representative he was and what he believed to be for the best interest of his country. He left an honorable record.

Though nominated without opposition, he withdrew his name and was not a candidate for election in November, 1928, having reached the conclusion that his impaired health was such that he should not again ask for election.

He was by far the strongest man in public favor in his district and was worthy of every honor conferred on him. He was an educator, a banker, a legislator in State and Nation, and successful in every line of endeavor. He was a Christian gentleman, a citizen of the highest type.

He was born in Lebanon, Mo., and on November 2, 1928, at the age of 66 years, he passed away there. I attended the funeral services of my much-loved colleague, held at his residence on Sunday afternoon, November 4. It was a beautiful ceremony, conducted under the auspices of the Masonic lodge of which he was a prominent member, and a wonderful tribute was paid by a great Mason before an immense audience of friends who came to do honor to the foremost citizen of that section, whose life and character was a wonderful example to all who knew him. His remains rest in the cemetery of his much-loved city of Lebanon.

He has gone to his reward. He leaves behind him his widow, an unusual woman, his companion in life. They were as lovers journeying together along pleasant paths. The recollection of his devotion, his high character, his love of right and of country, and of his many virtues of mind and heart will be an ever-present memory to cheer her as she lives her further life.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, TOM RUBEY, as we knew him during his long service as a distinguished Member of the House of Representatives, was born in the State of Missouri of fine parentage. He received a good education, having taken his degree from the University of the State of Missouri. For a number of years he taught school at Lebanon, Mo., and at the Missouri School of Mines at Rolla, Mo. Before coming to the Congress he saw service in the general assembly of his State, having served in both of its branches; and for two years, 1903–1905, he was lieutenant governor.

A thorough Missourian and a loyal member of his party, he achieved fame and greatness. His colleagues from that State regret his going. His widow and other loved ones can console themselves in the fact that THOMAS L. RUBEY was a man of character and attainments and put them to good use in the service of the people. Likewise can his friends join his loved ones in his passing and unite with them in saying:

His sun went down in the morning,
While all was fair and bright;
But it was not an eclipse of darkness
That hid him from our sight,
For the valley of death was brighter
Than the hills of the life he trod,
And the peace that fell on his spirit
Was the calm, deep peace of God.
His sun went down in the morning,
While all was fair and bright;
But it shines to-day on the hills far away
In the land that knows no night.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, in the death of THOMAS LEWIS RUBEY the House of Representatives mourns the loss of one of its ablest and most beloved Members. His constituents have lost a faithful, honest, and dependable friend and public servant. I have had the good fortune to know him intimately. I have been one of his constituents while he served well in the Missouri State Senate and as lieutenant governor of our State. In both of these positions he served with great credit and distinction, as he has done in every instance in which he has been called to public service.

THOMAS LEWIS RUBEY was born in Lebanon, September 27, 1862, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Rubey.

He spent his early life on the farm and attended the district schools and later the Lebanon schools. He then entered the University of Missouri, from which he was graduated with the A. B. degree.

Due to his interest in education, Mr. RUBEY was elected superintendent of the Lebanon schools, where he gained the distinction of being one of the foremost educators of the State.

The first office ever held by Mr. RUBEY was that of county school commissioner. This position came to him unsolicited by appointment from Gov. John S. Marmaduke. At that time Mr. RUBEY was superintendent of schools. He filled this unexpired term and at the next spring election was elected school commissioner.

In 1890 Mr. RUBEY was nominated by the Laclede County Democratic county convention as member of the legislature.

Although Laclede County was strongly Republican then, he was elected, and when the legislature met in January, 1891, he took his seat in the house of representatives at Jefferson City.

In 1892 Mr. RUBEY was selected by the board of curators as professor in the Rolla School of Mines, which position he held until the fall of 1897. He won the Democratic nomination and was elected to Congress for the first time in 1910.

Congressman RUBEY always was deeply interested in agriculture and served as a member of the House Committee on Agriculture during his terms in Congress. In the matter of education, he showed a keen desire to foster the public schools of the country as one of the greatest heritages of American boys and girls.

His was an admirable character. The longer and more intimately one knew him the more affection and respect one had for him and his views on any subject that gained his attention. I presume individuals have different means of estimating the characters of great men. Perhaps some traits of character make a stronger appeal than others. The traits of character possessed by TOM RUBEY which marked him as a really great man, according to what I consider the fundamental standard, were these: He was thoroughly honest and had no duplicity in his make-up. He was as loyal and as industrious in looking after the interests of the people whom he represented in Congress as he was in giving attention to his own private affairs; indeed, he was more so, for with him public service came first. It is my judgment he would be alive to-day had he not overtaxed his energies as he did in working so unceasingly in the interest of the farmers in their struggle for some relief from the unequal burdens thrust upon them during the few recent years. He worked overtime and with a commendable zeal to secure the passage of an agricultural relief measure. Combined with his rugged honesty and his unfailing energy in behalf of public service, there was his Christian character. That he possessed, and as I think of him in that character, I recall his own utterance on an occasion when he was speaking of a departed friend in these lines:

And to friends and loved ones who put their trust in him
"Who doeth all things well" there comes that sweet consolation:
We'll meet thee and we'll greet thee on the never-ending shore;
We'll dwell with thee in glory,
To be parted never more.

There are many of the finest products of nature that improve with age. In the main they are products that were always good, always wholesome, and time slowly, gradually, and perhaps imperceptibly strengthens, mellows, and enriches them. It gratifies me to know that this development which nature reserves for her best and rarest products was given a place in the life and character of my departed friend.

We always knew him as conscientious, honorable, and loyal, and as the years passed along there was with him a great measure of kind philosophy which embraced all mankind and a great tolerance of the opinions and views of others. There is perhaps a wide difference of opinion as to what constitutes the most desirable setting for our last days on this trying but interesting earth and our answer to the final summons to another sphere of activity; but the better judgment of mankind, it seems to me, inclines to an experience of usefulness and helpfulness until the hour of our departure shall strike, and to the hope of a peaceful passing into the shadows. From this point of view, with honors upon him, respected by all, and loved by those who knew him best, a good man, a faithful citizen, a devout Christian, passed to his reward.

Blessed are those whose ways are the ways of uprightness, whose days are days of usefulness, and who, answering the last summons, die in the Lord. In this manner so lived and died our friend.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of THOMAS LEWIS RUBEY this body has lost one of its able and outstanding Members. The great State of Missouri one of its most beloved citizens and native sons.

For many years THOMAS L. RUBEY taught in the Missouri School of Mines, a department of the University of Missouri. He also served in both branches of the general assembly of his State. He also served as lieutenant governor of his State and in this body for 16 years. In his long career of public service he believed "a public office was a public trust." The people's interests were his interests. He so lived that he had the respect and admiration of all who knew him. No man can ask more.

The memory of his labors and sacrifices will remain engraven on the hearts of the people of his district and State.

To those of us who knew him well his failing health was an unending sorrow. Day by day for the past year, with a smile on his face, concealing as best he could the never-ceasing pain from which he suffered, THOMAS L. RUBEY marked off his days. We knew that his case was hopeless and that good health was not to be for him. He knew it, too, of this I am convinced; yet never once did he decry his fate but went forward to the end, true to himself, his friends, and his trust, meeting all with a smile that spoke the great courage that was within him.

He met death as he had met life, with unfaltering faith and undaunted courage.

When we come to measure him and appraise his worth, we know—

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him, that nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man."

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. THOMAS LEWIS RUBEY this House lost one of its ablest, most useful, and highly esteemed Members. He was splendidly equipped for efficient public service. He had a vigorous, well-balanced, and well-trained mind. He possessed sound judgment and reached his conclusions by logical processes. It was not his habit to hastily form his opinions. He weighed every proposal carefully and subjected it to the acid test of reason, common sense, and right. But when he reached a decision he allowed nothing to swerve him from his duty as he saw it. He was strictly honest personally, politically, intellectually, and in every other way. He was courageous in advocacy of what he believed to be right. He was at all times outspoken and never quibbled or equivocated. Although he aggressively championed principles and policies which he believed to be just and reasonable, he was never unfair or intolerant toward those with whom he differed. He always had an open mind for the reception of truth. Because of his mental vigor, poise, sound judgment, and acute appreciation of ethical principles he was a valuable legislator, both in the general assembly of his State and as a Member of this House, the greatest legislative body in the world.

But, aside from those outstanding characteristics, he possessed a genial and lovable personality that bound men to him as with hoops of steel.

Though we mourn his home going, who of us will say that he died too soon or that he left his work uncompleted? When I contemplate his useful and upright life I can not view his death as a tragedy nor as the end of existence, like the death of an ox or the uprooting of a giant oak by a tropical storm, nor as marking the beginning of an eternal sleep, nor as a Buddhist Nirvana, or beatific emancipation of the human soul from responsibility and worldly woes and afflictions, by its loss of all personal consciousness, either by utter annihilation or by completely merging it into the Divine. No; death is far different from any of these conceptions.

Rather would I look on his death as a friendly stroke, painless in its touch, severing the silver cord that bound him to the finite. After blameless years, having finished his task sooner than others with whom he labored, with the serenity born of a Christian life and a Christian's hope, he uncomplainingly laid down life's threadbare but unspotted mantle and, following where airy voices led, he crossed a narrow strip of pathless, waveless, tideless sea to the enchanted shores of a blissful everlastingness, where angry billows never break and where in the Father's house of many mansions blissfully abide those whom we "have loved long since and lost awhile." Life's fitful fever over, in the palace of the King he wakes eternally.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, Representative THOMAS L. RUBEY was a faithful public servant in all that the term implies. He took his work seriously. No request from a constituent was too small to claim his personal attention, none so big but that he gave to it all that it demanded. A deep student of the problems of our day, he devoted much thought in an effort to help arrive at a proper solution of questions claiming the attention of the country. Especially was this true of agriculture.

Long a member of the Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives, Mr. RUBEY was splendidly equipped for the place. He was farmer minded. He knew and loved country folk. He was one of them. In his boyhood he was brought into intimate contact with the things of the country. He was no mock friend of the farmer. Although during the latter years of his life interested primarily in banking, his breadth of view, his natural sympathies, and his economic understanding caused him to be ever conscious of the fact that when the farmer is failing there can be no real and permanent prosperity for the cities. During the lengthy hearings held before the committee of which he was a member Mr. RUBEY was in constant attendance, even when not physically able. His first thought was of service to his people.

For more than a quarter century it was our privilege to know Representative RUBEY intimately and well, and we shall never cease to treasure his friendship. He was intensely human, honest in thought and deed, frank and outspoken when occasion demanded, yet charitable and kindly in his estimate of men. The people whom he served were to him more than his constituents; they were his friends, almost, in fact, as one big family. He never permitted his people to place him upon a pedestal. He preferred that they think of him first as a friend, and such he was in all that the word implies.

Not only did Representative RUBEY love the people whom he long represented in Congress, but he loved also the Ozark country, his homeland. To him the mountains and hills were as mounts of promise and inspiration on whose heights there might ever be heard sermons for those who understood. Fond of the open, he enjoyed the sports and recreations of forest and stream. To him the changing seasons, so attractive in the Ozark Mountains, where nature presents an ever-changing panorama, were intensely interesting stories. In God's great out of doors he was at his best and there he was never lonesome.

In view of Representative RUBEY's love for and understanding of the Ozark country, of the the joy he had felt, especially in the glories of the fall time, it seemed especially appropriate that after a long fight to regain his health he should have fallen asleep in early November, magic month in Missouri. When on a beautiful Sunday thousands of friends, including some of his colleagues, met in Lebanon to pay their last tribute of respect, all nature seemed to understand. The sun shone forth, not with unseeming blare and blazonry, but just enough to bring out the beauty of the Ozark blue. On a thousand hills, the hills of the land of his home, the Master Artist had produced wonderful pictures. Gold and red and brown were blended. Then, in a cemetery in the city of Richard Parks Bland, another eminent statesman of the Ozarks, and where great trees were growing, the mortal remains of Representative RUBEY were laid to rest. Lebanon had lost one it loved. City, district, State, and Nation were poorer for his passing, yet richer for his life.

As we drove toward our home that beautiful Sunday afternoon we thought much of the man, of the secure place he had held in the hearts of "the home folks," as he loved to refer to them, and of his fidelity and devotion. We could not think of him as dead. It was only the harvest time in the Ozarks. On the broad tablelands, or in the fertile, narrow valleys, corn was in shock. Fruition is in the fall time. It is the season of the finished product. So it was in the life of Representative RUBEY. He had done his work. A wise Providence had but called him home.

As we proceeded on our homeward journey, we understood more, too, of the part southern Missouri had played in our colleague's life. Driving now through a deep valley, darkness seemed near, but far up on the mountainside the sun was still shining. As the day died, the indescribable purple haze of the Ozarks crept slowly up the great hills producing an impression of abiding peace; the tinkle of cowbells was now and then audible, and with this perchance was the last evening note of a bird.

Now our improved highway takes us over the crest of a great hill, and again on a far ridge we catch the last rays of the sun. So it was in Representative RUBEY's life. He was ever climbing upward and looking for the sunlight if below him darkness seemed gathering. If he found among his associates doubtful qualities, he looked for the good. He preferred this. So, no wonder is it that the people whom he served in various capacities, and in all with credit, should think of him just as do you and I, not merely as a public official of ability, but first and last as a friend.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, out in the heart of the great Ozark Highlands of Missouri, where he was born, lies buried THOMAS LEWIS RUBEY, former Representative of the sixteenth district of Missouri. No Member of Congress was more faithful to his constituency than was Mr. RUBEY. He represented an agriculture district and his health declined while he fought the battle in the Agriculture Committee, of which he was a member for so long, and on this floor, in behalf of those who till the soil for a livelihood. While he came from a district alive with fertile valleys, his people, engaged in diversified farming, have their ups and downs. I have been in the vicinity of Laclede County, Mo., where Mr. RUBEY was born, died, and was buried, when the corn towered high, only in a few days to be washed away by a raging mountain stream, out of its banks. His people would smile at misfortune and start anew as soon as the water subsided.

TOM RUBEY, as he was known to the people of his district as well as to his colleagues here, served the people of 11 counties of Missouri for 15 years and 8 months, and he served them well. He was educated in his State, taught school in his State, and served his State in both branches of the legislature, as well as in the United States Congress.

His death, while a shock to us all, was not unexpected. Broken in health, he could always be found on this floor up to the close of the first session of this Congress. He had felt that a vacation in the Ozarks he loved so well would restore his old-time vigor, but finding progress slow after his return to Missouri, he withdrew as a candidate for reelection after receiving the nomination without opposition.

Mr. RUBEY was a lover of the great outdoors. A good fisherman, but a better hunter, he had roamed the hills of the Ozarks since a boy. The Niangua, Gasconade, Piney, and Meramee Rivers flowed through his district, as did many other mountain streams, and he spent his spare time taking the greatest of game fish from these rivers, hunting deer, wild turkey, quail, and other game on the hillsides. He loved a hunting dog, always possessed a good one, and was fond of talking of the dogs he had hunted over.

Honored with a public trust, he served those who honored him well. His devotion to his duties was exemplified by his almost perfect attendance at sessions of Congress until his health failed. His last great battle was in behalf of the McNary-Haugen bill. My views on this bill differed with his. In fact, all members of the delegation but one other and myself voted for the bill. Mr. RUBEY was anxious to have a solid Missouri delegation supporting the measure. It was the first time I had ever known him to solicit votes for a measure in which he was interested. He felt very keenly my opposition to the bill, but a few days after the vote we met and, placing his arm around me, said:

You did not vote for my bill, but you did what you thought was right, and for that I admire you. If you had asked me to vote for a bill which I did not think should be passed, I would also have refused.

Mr. RUBEY deserved the support he received from his constituents. There is not a man in his district who knew him, Democrats and Republicans alike, who would not say if you asked him about TOM RUBEY, "We miss him." This, I am sure, conveys the sentiments of the membership of this House, for I know we all miss him.

Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS. Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling mingled with regret and pleasure that I say a word in behalf of the memory of THOMAS LEWIS RUBEY, former Congressman from Missouri; regret that he is gone and his services are lost to the House, but with pleasure that his services have been so honorable and valuable to his constituents and our country.

The life of Mr. RUBEY is typical of so many successful, useful American boys. He was born in the Ozarks, and like many other Ozark boys procured an education as good as the mountain schools of his day afforded. He then became a teacher in order to obtain funds with which to advance his education. After his career as a teacher, he engaged in the banking business in Lebanon, Mo., where his recognized integrity and courtesy to his patrons built for him a successful business.

Later in life he was elected a member of the Missouri State Senate, where he served with distinction, and while serving as a member he was elected president pro tempore of that body. When a vacancy occurred in the office of lieutenant governor he automatically became lieutenant governor of Missouri, where he served until the end of his term.

His splendid record as a member of the State senate attracted the people of the sixteenth congressional district, and as a result he was elected to Congress, where he served nearly 16 years.

As a Member of Congress he was respected by his colleagues because of his honest, faithful official service. While a Democrat in politics, he never discriminated between the members of political parties in his district in the discharge of his official duties; and so diligent was he in his efforts to render efficient service that he continued at his post long after his physical condition was such as to make his work most distressing.

It can be said of him that his official life in Washington was a great honor to him and his family, and that his services were of great value to the people who honored him.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on the 2d day of November, 1928, in the beautiful city of Lebanon in southwest Missouri, THOMAS L. RUBEY passed to his eternal reward. Farmer, banker, school-teacher, and legislator, Mr. RUBEY was one of the great and good men of his generation.

Of a quiet and retiring disposition, he was drawn into the political arena where he occupied an important place for more than a quarter of a century. As a member of both houses of the Missouri Legislature, as lieutenant governor of that great State, and as a Member of this House for 16 years, he served his State and country conscientiously and well. He scorned sham and hypocrisy, and had none of the cunning of designing, scheming politicians. His strength lay in his quiet, plain, open, honest acts and conduct. He cared nothing for the flare of the trumpet or the beat of the drum. The pride and pomp and splendor of official life and position that may have fascinations and allurements for some made no appeal to him. The fawnings and flattery, the plaudits and praise of the populace never beguiled, deluded, or entranced him. There were no vainglorious, bombastic elements in his make-up. There was no crying of his many virtues from the housetops. His entire public duties were performed without parade or bluster. He was never swayed by the "madding crowd's ignoble strife," but "along the cool sequestered vale of life he kept the even tenor of his way."

A Democrat by nature and training his political advice was frequently sought by members of his party. Cool, calm, and conservative, his counsel was always regarded as safe and sound. In his legislative career he was a close student and attentive to routine work. Having been a professor for a number of years in a department of the Missouri University, he always took a deep interest in educational matters. For many years he was a member of the great Committee on Agriculture in this House and was ever solicitous for the welfare of the farmers.

His long experience in public life and his close application to the duties of the various offices held by him gave him a deep insight into the many and varying problems of government. He was an untiring worker. Even when the ravages of disease had undermined his health and sapped the strength and vigor of his younger manhood days, he carried on without murmur or complaint. His long distinguished public service stamps him as a careful, a wise, and an able legislator. In his passing the State of Missouri has lost one of its most progressive and distinguished citizens and the Nation a highly esteemed and valued statesman.

Influential, useful, and brilliant as was his public career, his business and private life was grander still. It was in his home and among the friends of his native city, who knew and loved him, that he was at his best. There it could be truly said of him:

None knew thee but to love thee,
Nor named thee but to praise.

Always working and striving to make his community a better place in which to live, he was progressive, forwardlooking, upstanding, taking the lead in every movement for betterment and improvement.

In any effort to secure a new schoolhouse or church house, or to bring about better social conditions, higher educational standards, higher and nobler moral and religious sentiments, Mr. RUBEY was always found in the vanguard fighting the battle. His kindly, affectionate, helpful service to the community will always be gratefully remembered. He won the confidence and gratitude of the people, not by gaudy show or brilliant display but by the quiet persuasiveness of his sterling worth and the convincing appeal of his deep sincerity. His friends believed in him. They trusted him. They had confidence in him. He met their faith and trust and confidence by unswerving devotion to duty and unwavering fidelity to their cause. His assistance and advice was constantly and quietly and freely given to those with whom he daily met and lived.

His life and character radiated light and warmth and sunshine, bringing hope and happiness to all with whom he came in contact. The night was never too dark or the road too long for him to go on an errand of mercy. If I were to seek the source of all his power and greatness, I would point to his genuine sincerity, his deep sympathies, his kindly spirit, and his earnest desire to help.

As long as real worth and sturdy manhood are recognized in official position and acclaimed in public ceremonies, as long as loyalty to friends and fidelity to duty are fostered and treasured and cherished, either in the courtly palace or around the humble fireside, so long will the name and memory of THOMAS L. RUBEY live in the hearts of his countrymen.

In the city of his birth and surrounded by throngs of sorrowing friends, he was laid to rest beneath a wealth of flowers. There amid the scenes of his boyhood days and the scene of many of his activities and achievements he rests in peace, with the blessings and benedictions of thousands whom he has befriended and helped along the way hovering over him.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY represented the State of Missouri as a Member of the House of Representatives in seven Congresses. During his entire service in the House he was a member of the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have had the honor to be chairman since 1919.

I had the honor and good fortune, by virtue of frequent contact during our long association, to have an opportunity to learn his splendid character, his noble qualities, and purposes so manifest in every walk of life, both public and private. He was a plain, unassuming, unpretentious, and unselfish man. He was a man of sterling qualities, of loving disposition, eminently sociable, pleasant, courteous, obliging, loyal, with a character founded on integrity, with a will to work his way honestly and bravely, endowed with lofty ideals, fortified with a wealth of experience and learning by long years of public life; pursuing his duty with industry, fidelity, unyielding courage, and fixity of purpose. The better I knew him the more I admired him, and realized why his constituents trusted him, and why he was held in such high esteem by his many friends.

Coming to Congress as he did with his genial disposition, keen intellect, noble character, and experience in legislative work, coupled with his patriotic, active, and effective public service, his unswerving and unusual devotion to truth, to the best interest of his State and Nation, always evident in his performance of public duty, naturally won him distinction and many friends.

It goes without saying that a life so bright, a character so pure, with such noble qualities, splendid career, and record as a statesman and citizen has made the world better and added to its happiness.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith insert the resolution adopted by the Committee on Agriculture on December 10, 1928, on the life and services of Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY, late a Representative of the State of Missouri and an honored member of this committee:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON THE LIFE AND CHARACTER OF HON. THOMAS L. RUBEY, LATE A REPRESENTATIVE OF THE STATE OF MISSOURI, AT A REGULAR MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE HELD ON MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1928

Whereas the Committee on Agriculture has heard with profound sorrow of the death of one of its prominent members, the Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY, late a Representative of the State of Missouri: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Committee on Agriculture in this meeting assembled, That in the death of Congressman RUBEY this committee has lost one of its most industrious, serviceable, and diligent members; the House of Representatives one of its most faithful servants; and the State of Missouri one of its most distinguished citizens.

Resolved further, That this committee extend to Mrs. Rubey its condolence and heartfelt sympathy in her hour of bereavement.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be made a permanent record of this committee and a copy be sent to his widow.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, one of the big honors that has come to me as a Representative in Congress was to be chosen as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and one of the chief benefits and pleasures that I received as a member of this committee was to get acquainted with the Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY, near whom I had the pleasure of sitting in the committee room.

I saw in Mr. RUBEY's face a kind expression that would make it possible for me, a new member, to go to him for the benefits of his mature judgment on public as well as private matters. I was never disappointed. When I sought his counsel I always received from him gracious consideration and an expression which proved that he had given to the question at hand the most profound thought. He spoke seldom in the committee, but whenever he rose the members of the committee listened eagerly for what he had to say. My five years of service with him had led me, as it had his other colleagues, to form a deep affection for him and to have a great respect for his devotion to public service.

One of my pleasant memories in connection with Mr. RUBEY is that he and his gracious wife stopped at my home in Wooster, Ohio, when they were driving back to Missouri at the close of a session of Congress.

The people of Missouri and the citizens of our country are better off for his having served and are the severe losers for his untimely taking off.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed grateful to the Missouri delegation for being permitted to pay my tribute today to the memory of Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY.

From the time that I met Governor RUBEY at Congress Hall Hotel almost immediately after his arrival to enter upon his duties as a Congressman until his death I considered him one of my best friends in Congress. He had served in previous Congresses; therefore, on his return he not only reclaimed his old friends but made friends with the new Members. He was assigned to the great Agricultural Committee, where he served with me until his death. It was on this committee that I had the pleasure of watching the statesmanship-like service of my colleague. It was only a matter of a few days before I observed his deep interest in his constituency, his State, and his Nation. I often visited with him at the hotel, in his office, and sat with him in the House, because I admired his friendly companionship and I had great confidence in his judgment on legislative matters. He was a man of few words, but honest and hard-working. He was a Democrat, but he knew no party or section when a bill had merit, and was for the interest of the great masses and his country. He seemed to understand his people and their needs. He spoke for and served his constituents as a man who knew he had the confidence of those he was serving.

In every instance it was not a matter of keeping his ear to the ground and the playing of politics, but his deep concern was in being right. No Member of this House had more concern about passing legislation proposing to put agriculture on an equality with other groups.

During the Seventieth Congress he returned to Washington almost physically undone, but his regular attention to the daily requests coming in from his constituents, to his work in the committee and the House cause me to say that truly he gave his life for his people, his country, and his God.

In conclusion let me say that his district, his State, and the entire Nation have suffered a great loss in the death of Governor RUBEY. This kind of man is not easily replaced in this body or in the affairs of State and Nation. He received many honors at the hands of his people in this life, and we, with them, mourn his untimely passing away. May the soul of my friend, as I am sure it does and will, forever rest in peace.

Our hearts bleed, but faith bids us look up. Jesus said, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forever more.

There is no death! The dust we tread
Shall change beneath the summer showers
To golden grain, or mellow fruit,
Or rainbow-tinted flowers.

They are not dead! They have but passed
Beyond the mists that blind us here
Of that serener sphere!

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it was with great regret that I heard of the death of my good friend and colleague, Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY, a Member of Congress from the sixteenth district of the State of Missouri. He was a Member of Congress before I had the pleasure of knowing him. I first became acquainted with him in the Sixty-eighth Congress, and from that time till his death we were members of the Committee on Agriculture. We were together much of the time and became good friends. He was one of the most active members of that committee and took a great interest in the problems of American agriculture. He was familiar with the hard work of the farmers and their dire distress during the past several years. He was always studying hard to find some new solution that would help them. He was truly their friend at all times. No man in Congress worked harder for their benefit than he did. He realized that there could not be any general prosperity in the land unless it was shared to some extent by the farmers. He was an able, conscientious, and industrious spokesman in their behalf and ever labored for their good. He represented them and all the people every day in this body. He never gave up but always pressed the fight for equality for them. They will never have a better friend in Congress or out. When the farm leaders came to Congress they went to see Congressman RUBEY because they knew where he always stood. He not only labored for agriculture but always favored all legislation for the best interests of his people, whom he loved.

He was a man of great heart and deep sympathy. He sympathized with the people of limited opportunities and many a poor man, woman, and little child felt the warmth of his kindly disposition. He went on the theory, which is a good one, that those who most deserved help by legislation needed friends in the American Congress, and he was always on the side of the people. Nothing could swerve THOMAS RUBEY from his plain path of duty. No flattery could sway him, defeat embarrass him, praise blind him, nor threats frighten him. When he decided what was his proper course for the right, he could not be diverted, but traveled the straight line toward the fulfillment of his desired achievements. He was as gentle as a child, fearless at all times, and had the friendship of every Member of the different Congresses in which he served. He was truly a representative of the people who honored him—and it was an honor for his people to keep him here—and always kept their best interests in mind. By close association with him as a member of the same committee and as Members of Congress for six years, I knew him well. Many times have I discussed with him the problems of agriculture and of the American people. His whole mind and soul were bent on doing what was right and best for the people. The last speech on the floor of the House that I heard him make was an earnest and able plea for the American farmer. He sympathized with the man and woman who work hard all day and never receive a sufficient amount for their labors to enable them to enjoy even the necessities of life. He believed that all honest men and women who work are entitled to some of the comforts of life that should recompense hard work and honest living. No person was too humble for him to listen to nor too poor for him to hear. No member of the committee to which he belonged stood higher than he and no man's counsel was more sought. He was always reasonable, logical, and agreeable. No man whom I have ever known appreciated frankness more than he and despised hypocrisy more intensely. He was never angered by honest disagreement, but accorded to all the right to their own opinions.

Many Congresses have gone, many more are yet to come, but in none of them has there been nor will there be a man more devoted to the public good than Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY. He not only honored the district that so wisely sent him here but he honored the State of Missouri and the whole American people. I never saw a man that I thought was a better citizen than him whom we honor here to-day. It is, indeed, fitting that we should assemble in the Nation's Capitol at this hour to do honor to his memory and praise a name and a life that can well be emulated by every young man in this land which we all love. He was an honor to this House and loved all our Members. THOMAS RUBEY did not live alone for himself, but for all his people and for his country. With our National Legislature in the hands of men like him, the country will be always safe. Nothing but the highest and purest thoughts ever entered his heart or mind. He always looked for the best in his friends and acquaintances and I never heard him say aught against any man during my acquaintance with him.

My life has been made brighter and better by having had the opportunity to associate with him and to know him so well. He was always actuated by the highest aims and the noblest thoughts. He, indeed, believed that "an honest man is the noblest work of God." He has gone to his reward, but has left a record of which his family, friends, and acquaintances may well be proud. The world is better because he lived here and mingled with his fellow men. Future legislation in Congress will bear the imprint of his work and thought while a Member. His advice, work, and counsel were greatly appreciated by his colleagues on the committee and in the House. And, at last, I can truly say, in the language of the poet—

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days!
None knew thee but to love thee,
Nor named thee but to praise.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, having served with Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY for several years on the Agricultural Committee, and though not a member of the same party as he, I wish to bear witness of the help derived from the intimacies of work by that great committee that Mr. RUBEY not alone was faithful in season and out of season in attendance but that he worked intelligently and patriotically for solid legislation in the demands the producers of our agricultural commodities rightfully had upon the Government. He revealed himself to me as a man of the highest probity, zealous in season and out of season in meeting the obligations, duties, and responsibilities that belonged to his high office.

The members of the committee appreciated his sound judgment. When "the Governor" had something to say regarding legislation or regarding the agricultural problems we were investigating he was given the greatest attention. It can truly be said of him that no district and no people in these United States had a more faithful representative than the district he represented.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Governor RUBEY was limited to the twilight of his life. The impression that he has left with me is that of a genial, kindly, courteous gentleman who painstakingly endeavored to fulfill his duties in public office despite the handicaps of age and illness. To the causes he believed in he gave a really intense allegiance. He never spared himself, coming to perform his duties as a member of the Committee on Agriculture or of the House when his physical condition really should have kept him at home. There is slight doubt that his conscientious attention to his work made less comfortable the last months of his life and probably shortened it materially. You never liked or respected him less for a difference of opinion, because the sincerity of his belief was always unquestioned.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with our late colleague, THOMAS L. RUBEY, was confined to the first session of the Seventieth Congress. During that time we were fellow members of the Committee on Agriculture. Notwithstanding the fact that his health was very much impaired, Mr. RUBEY was most faithful in his attendance of committee meetings and took a keen interest in every measure for the advancement of agriculture. His long legislative experience and many years of service on the committee made his counsel and suggestions of great value. In his death this House lost an able Member and his district an experienced and capable representative.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere regret that I arise on this occasion, for it is always sad to chronicle the passing of a dear friend.

As a member of the Committee on Agriculture in the Seventieth Congress, I was privileged to know the Hon. THOMAS LEWIS RUBEY, and to sit with him through many an interesting hearing upon matters touching farm relief and other agricultural subjects.

Even then he was in ill health, and it was only his courage and his devotion to the interests of the country, I am sure, that kept him at work, where self-interest should have dictated greater care of himself.

He was always the courteous gentleman—friendly and sympathetic, helpful with suggestions to those of us with less experience. I mourn his passing away, and shall always cherish his memory.

Mr. MAJOR of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this day and hour has been set apart by this body for memorial services for the departed Members of the Seventieth Congress.

As this roll is called the names of Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY, of the sixteenth Missouri district, and that of Hon. CHARLES L. FAUST, of the fourth Missouri district, appear upon the list of those who have answered the last roll call of this, the greatest legislative body in the world, to appear before the judgment bar of God, before whom we shall, sooner or later, come to give an account of our stewardship.

I have been asked by the Hon. C. C. DICKINSON, dean of the Democrats, and the Hon. L. C. DYER, dean of the Republicans, of the Missouri delegation, to participate in the services of to-day in memory of our departed Members. It is an honor to do honor to the memory of the good. Heralded with the velocity of electricity by wire and radio, the sad intelligence has been borne to every hamlet in the land that Missouri has lost two of its foremost citizens and this body two of its most useful and outstanding Members, Mr. RUBEY, a member of the great Committee on Agriculture, and Mr. FAUST, a member of the great Committee on Ways and Means—one a Democrat, the other a Republican, and both personal friends of mine. Their vote in the districts that repeatedly honored them is a testimonial of the esteem in which they were held by their constituents; their committee assignments are proof of their standing with their colleagues and in their party; and their records evidence that they fully appreciated the honors bestowed upon them and were true to the trust reposed in them. They were able, honest, and courageous. They were loved by their friends, respected by all of their colleagues, and honored by the constituency they served so faithfully and so well. Both died at their posts of duty.

We do not like to think and talk of death, and it is only when some bright particular star falls, or the train of eternity whistles near our own door, that train which has no surveyed route, no schedule, no stated stations; every home on God's earth a depot, and every member thereof a sure and certain passenger, that we take time to pause and ask: "Watchman, what of the hour?" and are reminded with the poet:

Life, I knew not what thou art
But know that thou and I must part,
And when, and how, and where we met,
I own to me is a secret yet.
Life, we've been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time
Say not good night, but in some brighter clime
Bid me good morning.

TOM RUBEY and CHARLIE FAUST, as they were known and called by their friends and colleagues, were strong partisans, with strong political convictions, party feeling, and attachments, both believed that the interest of their country could be best served through the principles advocated by their respective parties. Though of different political faith, we loved and honored them both for their many sterling qualities and devotion to duty. In this sad hour we grieve with their families, their friends, and associates. In their political battles they fought for what they conceived to be the best interest of their country, and the breath of suspicion never tarnished the rectitude of their actions or the purity of their purpose, and dying left behind them an example that patriots will love to honor and many deeds worthy of emulation.

Their personal characters were replete with those qualities that make up the perfect gentleman—courteous to all, chivalrous, the soul of honor, with unquestioned courage; they endeared themselves to all they came in contact with. In those tender and more endearing relations of friendship, kindred, and neighbor, they were all that friendship could ask, affection claim, or kindness enjoin. They were Christian gentlemen, true to themselves, their friends, and their country.

In some countries there is a tradition that the spirit of their departed leaders, who in their lives were revered and honored, revisit the land of their love, and when the moon is shedding down its softest and its sweetest beams upon the earth the spirit of the departed leader descends and, passing over the land, blesses the fields and the meadows, and whispers low upon the night winds words of wise counsel to his people. Could these conditions prevail, TOM RUBEY and CHARLIE FAUST, though dead, would far into the future counsel and labor for the people of their districts, their State and Nation, whom they loved so well and served so faithfully.

In their death we are again reminded:

That death comes equally to us all, and makes us all equal when he comes.

Their noble spirits have taken their flight to the God who gave them, so touchingly exemplifying that—

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

WILLIAM ALLAN OLDFIELD

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the death of WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, of Arkansas, in the Capital City of the Nation on the 19th day of November, 1928, marked the passing of a remarkable man, who for 20 years had been one of the recognized distinctive personalities of the House and a party leader of resource and energy, loved and respected by his associates of every political faith.

When on the morning of February 4, 1874, a child was born to Milton T. and Anne Matheny Oldfield in the village of Franklin, Izard County, Ark., there was nothing to indicate that this son of the village blacksmith would have such an active and useful career and achieve the extraordinary distinction that crowned his efforts. He attended the rural schools and, after he graduated from the Melbourne High School, his family moved to Batesville, Ark., to enable him to finish his education in Arkansas College. Working to defray his expenses, he completed his course in that institution, graduating in 1896. He then engaged in that activity which, in many instances, has been a part of the training of many of America's distinguished men—teaching school in Little River County, Ark. At the outbreak of the Spanish-American War he volunteered his services and assisted in organizing a company of which he became first lieutenant. At the close of that war he returned to Batesville and began the study of law, and was admitted to the bar in 1900. Possessed of marked ability, a strong, pleasing, radiant personality, and a love of his fellow men, it was but natural for him to enter the political arena. In 1902 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the third judicial circuit and reelected to another term in 1904. In his boyhood, while assisting his father in the village blacksmith shop, he met the Congressman from his district, and as a result there was born in his ambitious breast the determination to fill that position. His first candidacy for Congress in 1906 met with defeat, but in 1908 he was successful, and from the date of his entrance into this body until his death he was one of its most active Members. His intense loyalty to his party and his aptitude and capacity for practical organization very early won for him an influence in Democratic councils, and for several years prior to his death he had rendered splendid service as chairman of the Democratic congressional campaign committee.

His ability and industry were recognized by his election many years ago to membership of the Ways and Means Committee.

For 20 years, diligent, active, aggressive, yet genial and fair, he was in the front ranks of the contests waged in this forum, and his passing is a distinct loss, not alone to his loved ones, his district, his State, and his party, but to the entire Nation he served with such fidelity and zeal.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD the Nation lost a patriot, the State of Arkansas an eminent son, the second congressional district of his State an energetic and devoted servant, and I a sympathetic and loyal friend. To no Member of this body did the term "no middle aisle" so directly apply, for while he was a man of strong convictions and possessed the courage to utter and defend them, his uniform courtesy, his tolerant bearing, and his unfailing sense of fairness so impressed his adversaries that no enemies were made and no spirit of resentment was aroused. He enjoyed as but few have the confidence and esteem of his colleagues and the citizenry he so ably represented.

Mr. OLDFIELD was a native of his State and district. He was educated in its schools. Born on February 4, 1874, he completed his college course with an A. B. degree in 1896 and entered upon the practice of law at Batesville, immediately impressing his worth upon the public. When war was declared against the Kingdom of Spain in 1898 he followed the patriotic urge in the hearts of all true sons and tendered his services, enlisting as a private in Company M, Second Regiment of Arkansas Infantry, and was discharged at the conclusion of the war as a commissioned officer. He returned home and renewed the practice of his profession with such outstanding success that he was selected in 1902 to fill the important office of prosecuting attorney of the third judicial circuit. His service was conspicuous and won a second term, at the conclusion of which he retired and returned to the practice of law in association with Hon. Charles Y. Cole, the present United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. The demonstration of rare capacity, his high sense of honor, combined with unquestioned integrity, had so impressed the people he served that when the distinguished Member from his congressional district, the Hon. Stephen Brundige, retired, Mr. OLDFIELD was called to the Congress, entering the Sixty-first. He served continuously for 20 years, and at the time of his death was holding a commission for the Seventy-first. No public servant enjoyed to greater extent the absolute confidence and affections of those whom he represented. No constituency enjoyed more the loyalty and love of a servant. He was able, alert, and untiring in his labors, and such characteristics so impressed his colleagues that he was induced to assume many responsibilities incident to his duties as a Member of the Congress. Through his proven reliability and capacity he gradually ascended the scale of committees until he reached the Ways and Means, the outstanding one of the House, of which he was a member at his death. He was a member of the Democratic congressional committee for many years and directed its activities brilliantly as chairman for two years and was in such position when the summons came. He was the Democratic whip, and the expression is universal that he was incomparable in such office.

Mr. OLDFIELD was a burden bearer serving the whole of his political career.

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

The great concourse of sorrowing people coming from every walk of life, meeting in his beloved city in sadness and grief on the day of his funeral, the lengthy procession accompanying his remains to the last resting place, and the profusion of beautiful flowers attested his popularity. The eulogies of Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON and Minority Leader Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT, and the funeral sermon of the pastor of his chruch brought manifestation of profound sorrow from the throng crowded in the home church.

Our colleague was blessed with one of the rare jewels of womanhood in his helpmate. The devotion existing and continuing throughout his life was an inspiration to the youth of our land. Ever standing by his side, aiding and encouraging him in his labors, sharing his trials and successes in a perfect sympathy. Our hearts are heavy with grief that she must suffer the loss of such ideal companionship.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sad heart that I arise to pay a tribute of love and respect to the life and memory of my lifelong friend, the Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, of the second district of Arkansas. For more than 30 years the people of his district joyfully gave him whatever honors he sought. For four years he was prosecuting attorney of his district, and he so ably, successfully, and justly served in that capacity that he was elected to the Sixty-first Congress to succeed a man who had made a national reputation by his service here. Mr. OLDFIELD was a native of the district that honored him, and it was his lifelong friends who passed judgment upon his life and character at the polls and sent him here to serve in a greater field.

The luxuries of life were not given to him, and while he succeeded in graduating from one of the principal educational institutions of his State, it was only by industry, thrift, economy, and a desire to succeed and make himself a useful man that he was able to accomplish this. So hard did he labor and so faithfully did he serve here that he was soon made a member of the great Committee on Ways and Means. His hobby was a tariff for revenue only, and he willingly battled the great minds on the other side of the aisle whenever a bill to increase a tariff was presented. He asked no quarter and he made no compromises, and although he oftentimes met defeat, his sword was always flashed on the side of right, and when he went down he held aloft the flag of the people. In the Sixty-seventh Congress he was selected the Democratic whip, a most important and responsible position, especially for the minority. It was his duty to meet with the leaders to plan our procedure, to keep the lines of his own party together, and to see that no discord was in the ranks. A better man for this duty could not have been found in Congress. Harmony was his watchword, and no two men of his party could drift so far apart that he could not reconcile their differences. He was free to praise and he never hesitated to criticize when necessary, but his criticism was constructive and he never offended the most sensitive.

Without hesitation I say that he was the most popular man in the House of Representatives. He was aggressive and so loved his party and its principles that he often had strong opponents, but I doubt if he had an enemy. He had both great moral and physical courage. While he took great pride in his service in civil life I believe he looked back upon his short military service while his country was at war with Spain with greater pleasure. His years were devoted to active public service and he was known best as a statesman; but one of his greatest characteristics was his affection for his wife and love of home. Those of us who were privileged to be his intimates and knew him by close association with him and his wife, saw in him one of the gentlest and most considerate of husbands. He was never blessed with a child, and all his deep affection was given to her who had taken the pledge to walk by his side in the shadows as well as in the sunlight. From the day that he met his girlhood sweetheart he cared for no other, and when their love grew into marriage they became real partners. So complete and equal was this partnership that each affectionately called the other "Pard."

His was a life of service. He was one of the great men of the House. We mourn him, but feel that while he must for a time sail that dark and unknown sea called "death," yet in the fullness of time he will anchor on the golden shore of the sunlit sea of everlasting life, where he will be privileged to wait and watch the coming of the sail that will reunite him to the one he left behind.

For love will hope, and faith will trust
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, the death of WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD was mourned in every section of the country. His association with Members representing both parties in Congress was such as to bring genuine grief to all who intimately knew him.

To those who represent the minority party in the House of Representatives his passing meant the loss of one who manifested a personal interest in the fortunes of each member of his party. His death therefore brought a personal sorrow to each of his colleagues on the minority side, most of whom had drafted heavily from time to time upon his obliging nature. However, it was from every section of the State he loved so much that his death was so deeply mourned. BILL OLDFIELD was proud of Arkansas and Arkansas was proud of BILL OLDFIELD. At his burial in the little city of Batesville, resting in the beauty of the Ozark Mountains, citizens from all sections of Arkansas and from the remotest parts of his own congressional district gathered to pay their last respects to one who had served long and well their interests. The ceremonies were beautiful and impressive, but one could not stand in that multitude unmindful that the greatest tribute paid to our departed friend was the sorrowing presence of those representing all the walks of life—the rich and the poor, the weak and the strong, coming alike to pay a last tribute to a leader whom they had followed with pride and loyalty.

One in public life is often beset with discouragements and is sometimes prone to meditate whether his efforts in public service are worth while. But when the rank and file in a great outpouring came to the last rites of a public servant of many years, it is such an unmistakable evidence of appreciation and affection that we, who are left, find heart to carry on with the consciousness that among the great American people, an honest public service will always find its just reward.

Mr. OLDFIELD was noted throughout his State for his capacity in forming strong friendships. He has so often spoken to me of the loyalty of his friends. To my own knowledge he did not underestimate them. But back of the loyalty of BILL OLDFIELD'S friends was first the loyalty of BILL OLDFIELD to a friend. Around the faults of a friend no man threw a broader robe of charity. This made men love him; this made men follow him in almost blind adoration.

Then, again, he was a man of courage. He rarely paused to give expression to his conviction. When once convinced of the righteousness of a course he had little patience with any scheme to avoid whatever its consequences might be. The lines of least resistance might have served to make his career more a path of roses than it was ever his to share, but it would have meant the practice of a duplicity entirely foreign to his disposition. He was a rarity in modern politics, in that he tried always to take an unqualified stand on all questions of public concern.

His friends not only loved him for his loyalty and courage but they loved his determined spirit. He came from the rank and file. He was an offspring of those who walked in humble but honorable paths. He was the son of that mighty concourse of American people who have made our Nation's Hall of Fame. Call it "ambition," "urge," "determination," or whatever you will, but that spirit or disposition lifted BILL OLDFIELD from the humble environs of a blacksmith's home to one of the leaders in the Lower House of our National Congress. It would be no fairy tale to relate the manner in which he gained such eminence, but the true story would disclose a severe struggle to overcome many difficulties. It was his disposition to meet and to master that associated his name with distinction and honor.

With the background of a good home and family relation as a boy and young man and the inspiring influence of a good wife, BILL OLDFIELD used his splendid faculties to accomplish a successful career. Had he lived he would have been called to still greater fields of service to his fellow men.

It should be a sweet consolation to his family and his friends that they were given a part in the construction of his wonderful career.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a renewed sense of personal loss that I speak of the death of Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD. He was for many years a most active member of the Committee on Ways and Means, having participated in the great measures of financial reconstruction following the World War. His devotion to the public service was signalized by activities in civil life, by patriotic service in the war with Spain, and well-earned promotion, and by a legislative career in Congress, in which he rose to be a vigorous and directing force in the party of which he was a valued member. He gave his heart to whatever cause enlisted his support. He attacked with vigor and defended strongly. Earnest, honorable, likable, we all admired him. Our regret at his final departure is deep and sincere.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of genuine and profound sorrow and regret that I contemplate the death of my good friend and colleague, WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD. He had already won his spurs in the House at the time I was first elected to Congress. It was not long after I took up my service that I was attracted to BILLY OLDFIELD by his genial personality and soon became acquainted with him.

That acquaintance grew and ripened after my election to the Committee on Ways and Means, of which he was a member, and it developed into a real friendship which shall always live with me as one of the happy memories of my service in Congress. We differed very widely at times on the various legislative matters which came before our committee for consideration, particularly on tariff and revenue legislation; but this difference of opinion, which was at all times an honest one, did not interfere with our friendship for each other.

WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD was a man of strong convictions. He was in every sense of the word a Democrat and a believer in the dogmatic principles of his party. He gave much time and study to the intricate workings of all legislation affecting the revenues of the Nation, and he was a conscientious advocate of what he thought was best for the country.

A lawyer, a soldier in defense of his country in time of war, an able and efficient legislator in times of peace, the Nation, like the young and vigorous State which he in part represented in the Halls of Congress, loses a distinguished citizen and a loyal patriot in the death of WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, while we who have been his colleagues for many years shall miss him and mourn him for his lovable character and friendship.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to have been intimately acquainted with Mr. OLDFIELD. I met him in 1909 at the first session of the Sixty-first Congress. We were both new Members and the acquaintance formed nearly 20 years ago soon ripened into a sincere and lasting friendship. For over 10 years we sat side by side on the same committee, and meeting almost daily I had ample opportunity to become familiar with those qualities of heart and mind that characterized WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, and so endeared him to all with whom he came in contact.

Death during this Congress has exacted a heavy toll from the Committee on Ways and Means. Three of its members—THADDEUS C. SWEET, of New York; CHARLES L. FAUST, of Missouri; and WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, of Arkansas—have answered the Reaper's call and, "crossing over the river, are now resting in the shade of the trees." They were all outstanding men, men whose deaths were irreparable losses, not alone to their districts and their States but to the country at large.

BILLY OLDFIELD, as he was affectionately called by his friends, was a natural leader of men. Able, studious, loyal, enthusiastic, and true to every trust, he possessed many of those qualities which the world calls human greatness. Greatness is a comparative word. One of the frailties of human nature is the proneness to believe that in the past those who rose above their fellows and were called great attained the mountain summits of a fame beyond almost the hope of the present generation to secure. We are therefore reluctant to assert and hesitate to declare to-day that which posterity will emphatically affirm to-morrow.

No revenue act providing for the huge sums necessary to pay America's part in the conduct and prosecution of the greatest war in all the ages was ever enacted by the American Congress that in every phase of its construction WILLIAM OLDFIELD did not play a prominent part. He took the lead in legislation looking to the relief of our sick, wounded, and disabled soldiers. As a member of the subcommittee that drafted the adjusted compensation act he rendered invaluable service and many of his wise suggestions are now crystallized into law.

He was an ideal chairman of the congressional campaign committee. He loved the Democratic Party, and I have never known a more devoted adherent. No defeat could dampen his ardor, no disaster could destroy his optimism, but always the day after he was the first to see the silver lining and with boundless enthusiasm and sublime confidence he was again ready to "carry on."

Notwithstanding his intense partisanship his personal friends in the House were limited only by the number of Members in that body. He fought the opposition and he fought hard, but he always fought in the open. He was honest and candid and fair, and I heard as many genuine expressions of sorrow and regret over his untimely death on the Republican side of the House as I did on his own.

It was my melancholy privilege to be present at his funeral in the little town of Batesville. The stores and other business houses were closed during the ceremonies, and there was genuine sorrow and concern upon the faces of all. The Methodist Church was unable to accommodate the vast throng of those who not only from Arkansas but elsewhere came to pay their last tribute of love and respect to one who in every way reflected in his own life the true simplicity and the splendid manhood so characteristic of his proud Commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, the country needs more men like BILLY OLDFIELD—men of lofty ideals and Christian character; men who have the courage of their convictions; men who, when they know they are right, "are not afraid to say no, though all the world may say yes"; men large of heart, large of brain, large of human kindness, and large in all those qualities which constitute real greatness.

BILLY OLDFIELD has passed away. No longer will we see his smiling face and hear his friendly voice. He has passed away, but he is not forgotten, for he has left behind him that greatest of all legacies—"an honored name, the memory of earnest deeds well done."

Statesman, yet friend of truth; of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear;
Who broke no promise, served no private end,
Who gained no title, and who lost no friend.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, it is a happy circumstance, though probably not known to the general public, that party affiliation has no bearing upon the personal and social relationships of Members of the House of Representatives. Friendships are formed here, as elsewhere, upon opportunities for acquaintanceship and mutuality of interest and confidence. The standing, and to a limited degree the select, committees of the House furnish such occasions for intimate associations on the part of their Members. Particularly is this true as to those committees, like that on Ways and Means, where sharp differences of opinion may arise and where the Members get into close personal contact. It was in the exchange and conflict of views in the Committee on Ways and Means that I had the privilege of becoming really acquainted with our late colleague, the Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, of Arkansas. There was many a sting in his political and partisan utterances on the floor of the House and in his press interviews as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee. He was as intense a Democrat as I am a Republican. What is more, if I understood him correctly, he was a Democrat of the old school, a fundamentalist in party doctrine and adherence, and I, for one, honored his consistency and frankness. His party appreciated his worth and placed him in position of organization authority. But what a kindly, gentle, and considerate soul he was in his personal contacts! How affable, straightforward, and open-hearted in his conversation and demeanor! No partisanship there, no personal grudges or disagreements, no disappointments or animosities of any kind! He seemed fit for a long life of service and contentment, but the Grim Reaper mowed him down in the very prime of life. How strange the fortunes of men! How little we know our destiny! Our genial, industrious, and capable colleague, the genuine gentleman from Arkansas, is with us no more, and none mourn his loss and miss his presence among us more than his associates, Republicans and Democrats alike, on the committee which was honored and benefited by his service upon it.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, when on November 19, 1928, the soul of Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD crossed the borderland and entered eternity, the Commonwealth of Arkansas and our beloved Nation sustained an irreparable loss, for, truly, one of the leading statesmen of our day passed from his sphere of earthly usefulness. In early manhood he served his State and country on the field of battle in the Spanish-American War, and for meritorious conduct was promoted from private to lieutenant. For 20 years, he had rendered faithful and efficient service to his people in the House of Representatives. He was a man of splendid mental attainments, of magnetic personality, of deep convictions, and possessed the moral and political courage at all times to defend them. He believed in the principles of Democracy and was a militant Democrat and ever ready to bear the gage of battle for his party. He was a fighting partisan of the highest type, giving hard blows to his opponents and serenely bearing any blows leveled at him. He neither gave nor asked quarter from a political foe, but was at all times a gentleman. He was a true tribune of the masses of the people, his heart's great desire being to protect their interest and to render them service. His life was open; his noble purposes and high character commanded the respect and admiration of all who knew him. In his political debates he left no stings and he never bore malice. He was universally beloved by the membership of the House irrespective of political affiliations.

That his own people loved, trusted, and appreciated him is evidenced by the fact that they elected his capable and beloved wife to represent them as his successor in this august body. Mr. OLDFIELD's devotion to his party caused him to battle for it in the last presidential campaign, when he was not physically able to stand the strain; and this unselfish, heroic sacrifice undoubtedly hastened his end. He was in the prime of intellectual manhood, in the zenith of his power and usefulness, a recognized leader in the House, a statesman of national reputation, when the final summons reached him.

And could we choose the time and choose aright,
'Tis best to die, our honors at the height.

It was my good fortune to know him well, having sat next to him in the Ways and Means Committee room for 14 years. He was always at his post of duty. He was fearless, able, courteous, warm-hearted, and unselfish, and enjoyed the love and confidence of his fellows. We scarce hope to look upon his like again.

Statesman, yet friend of truth; of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear;
Who broke no promise, served no private end,
Who gained no title, and who lost no friend;
Ennobled by himself, by all approved.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, it is a sad and difficult thing for one who admired and loved WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD as I did to attempt even a few words in the nature of an eulogy.

Mr. OLDFIELD preceded me as a Member of Congress by two years. He came in the Sixty-first and I in the Sixty-second Congress. Had he lived to the end of the Seventieth Congress he would have served 20 years. The fact that he was kept in Congress consecutively for so long a period of time is evidence of the high esteem in which he was held by the people of his district and the supreme confidence they had in him.

In the passing of Mr. OLDFIELD there is not any doubt but that Congress lost one of its ablest, most useful, and influential Members. His devotion to duty, his courtesy to every Member of the House, profound knowledge of great national problems were manifest at all times. He specialized in matters of taxation and had mastered this subject in detail perhaps as thoroughly as any Member of the House of Representatives.

I shall ever cherish with fond recollection and gratitude the many acts of kindness he extended to me. He was approachable, courteous, and considerate even to the extreme at all times. When I entered upon my duties as a Representative I was greatly aided by his wise counsel and sympathy.

As chairman of the Democratic congressional committee he rendered great service to his party.

His calling away, seemingly in the midst of a brilliant public career, is one of the mysteries of Providence too profound for human understanding.

BILLY OLDFIELD possessed every qualification of mind and character essential in the making of a truly great man. In fact, the life of WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD was filled with useful deeds and unselfish service. His passing was perhaps as nearly a personal loss to every Member of the House as any man who has served in our body in this generation.

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the span of life is measured not so much by time as by accomplishment. Years denote only length, but accomplishment means volume. Simply to have lived for a term of years means little to the world, but to have filled those years with crowded action of useful service gives width and depth, richness, and splendor to life. In the drama of human progress attention is focused upon those who take the rôles of leadership. But leadership is the culmination of years of preparation, growth, and development. More years are required in the preparation for life's greatest service than in the performance of that service.

When Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD passed from this life on the 19th of last November he was a national character, one of the leaders in the political affairs of the Government; a leader in his own political party; whip of the Democratic Party in Congress and chairman of the national Democratic congressional committee. He lacked only a few months of having served 20 years as a Member of Congress when he moved on to take his place in history.

It is said that "a life that is lived is a tale that is told." His life was full of action, accomplishment, and progress. A comprehensive story of his life can find expression only in the deeds he wrought and the goal he attained. His career was a phenomenal rise from an obscure beginning to an ending of national fame.

WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD was born in the small village of Franklin, in Izard County, Ark., shortly after the end of the "reconstruction period," which left the people of that State in economic ruin. His father was Milton T. Oldfield and his mother was Anne (Matheny) Oldfield. He had three sisters, one older and two younger than he. It was a happy family; love and aspiration predominated. The early years of his boyhood were spent in this village of his birth. We called him Will. He was popular. He was a real boy, loved a good time, was full of fun, played first base on the ball team, was a good swimmer, and a lover of all boyish sports. He was an all-round good fellow. He was a handsome, wholesome, brilliant boy. WILL OLDFIELD attended the public and "subscription" schools in Franklin. He stood high in his classes but did not devote all of his time to study. He did not have to. He found time occasionally to disturb the quietude of his immediate section of the schoolroom. In that time the teachers operated under the principle of "Spare the rod and spoil the child." WILL OLDFIELD took his chastisement with the other boys, and always came out of it smiling. As a boy he was a good sport and indomitable. He never lost these traits of character.

When he was about 10 years of age his family moved to the town of Newburg and later to the county-seat town of Melbourne in order to have better school facilities. It was in the public schools and academies of these towns that WILL OLDFIELD received his preparation for college. He was now about 17 years of age. Then came the problem of finances for his college course. He had no money and his father was not financially able to send him to college. The hard times of the nineties gripped that country. He worked as a hired laborer, made cotton crops on shares, taught country schools, and borrowed some money. Through such means and by practicing rigid economy he finished the liberal arts course in the Arkansas College in Batesville, Ark., graduating therefrom in 1896. Following his graduation he engaged in teaching for a time as the principal of a high school. In 1898 he enlisted as a private for service in the Spanish-American War. He was discharged from that service with the rank of first lieutenant. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and entered the practice of law in Batesville, Ark. In 1902 he was elected prosecuting attorney for the district comprising the counties of Independence, Stone, Jackson, and Lawrence in that State, and was reelected in 1904. Between 1906 and 1908 he was engaged in private practice. In 1908 he was elected to Congress from the second congressional district of Arkansas and was reelected successively at each general election thereafter. He died 13 days after his last reelection to Congress, in November, 1928.

At the time Mr. OLDFIELD was in Arkansas College Miss Pearl Peden was also a student in that school. It was there that the romance of love between them had its beginning, which was later attested and solemnized in their marriage. It was a happy marriage. That romance has endured.

I knew WILL OLDFIELD from his early childhood. As a boy, as a young man, as a matured man I knew him. I knew him on the playground, in school, in the court room, in Congress. There was no guile in him and no pessimism. He got pleasure out of life and radiated it to his associates. He loved his fellows and was loved by them. Life held for him the prospect of success. Hope and courage never deserted him. He believed in the principle of justice and square dealing. The belief that all men are entitled to equal rights was with him a passion. He was a great Democrat with a capital "D"; he was a greater democrat with a small "d." WILL OLDFIELD made no effort to play to the galleries. He was not spectacular; but with a constancy of purpose he followed the course that led toward the greatest service and the accomplishment of his ideals. No words of mine can adequately express my appreciation of him. His was a humble beginning in a community atmosphere not especially inspiring, but he burst the shell of provincialism and rolled back the encompassing horizon until he saw and was seen as a national character.

WILL OLDFIELD, who, as a barefoot boy found pleasure in shooting turtles along the banks of Strawberry Creek, became a leader in the National Congress. What dreams may he not have had when his youthful eye watched the ceaseless flow of the smaller streams toward the larger rivers that in turn led on to the sea. Certain it is that in him was the developing vision that gave a glimpse of greater opportunities in a richer and broader life.

He pursued this unfolding visualization in response to an urge that inhered in him and would not be denied. The chrysalis breaks the imprisoning cocoon and reaches perfect development. The human will and intellect must break the encasing walls of limiting vision to gain the broader outlook on life. It is a far cry from the sand-lot ball ground of Franklin, Ark., to the Halls of Congress, but the distance was spanned by WILL OLDFIELD by the time he was 34 years of age.

The sentiment that a prophet is without honor in his own country does not hold good in his case. The district he represented in Congress for 20 years embraces the county of his birth. He never lost touch with the friends of his earlier life. He bound them to him by ties stronger than hoops of steel. He justified their confidence by keeping faith with them. Their admiration and respect for him developed into idolization. They feel that he was part of their life, and in them was pride in his advancement. They were as loyal to the cause of his success as they would be to their own interests, for in their view he was a part of themselves.

No native son ever inspired more devoted allegiance or held more firmly the strength of popular sentiment. They watched him grow from boyhood to mature manhood. They watched him develop and unfold the powers of mind and soul that brought him, the son of a village blacksmith, to leadership among men; even as David, the shepherd boy, became the King of Israel. In the hearts of the people of his own district the life and service of WILL OLDFIELD will find a shrine of love and devotion that will endure for all time.

When I first came to Congress, WILL OLDFIELD had been here 14 years. He was already a veteran in the halls of national legislation. He was mature in judgment and secure in the honor that comes with distinguished service. He was already a leader in his own party and in the Congress. His name was on the Nation's lips. He was a national character. To him had come the recognition which his public service commanded. I shall not discuss the scope of that service. Other colleagues will no doubt elect to do so.

The last illness of WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD was of short duration. When the press agencies flashed to the world the sad intelligence of his passing my heart was heavy. I could hardly realize that he was gone from us. It seemed unreal that we should not see him again in his accustomed rôle in the Halls of Congress. His going has left a void that can not be filled. He sacrificed health and physical life in the fulfillment of duty. But he still lives in the annals of his country and in the hearts of the people. Our own lives have been enriched and broadened by his association. He has given us the inspiration of service and progress and the ideal of a life abundantly lived. He was my friend and I respected, admired, and loved him.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, we mourn the death of our departed friend and colleague, Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, who for nearly 20 years ably and faithfully represented the second congressional district of the State of Arkansas. It is a sad privilege to pay a brief but heartfelt tribute to his memory and the public service rendered by him.

Others will tell the story of his useful life; the fidelity with which he served his country both in war and in peace; the service which he rendered to the people in positions of trust at home and before he was sent to Congress; and finally the enviable record which he made during his service here. He won for himself a position of leadership in the House and he enjoyed the confidence and friendship of its entire membership throughout the years of his service.

He and I entered Congress together in 1909. From that time until "God's finger touched him" and he passed on to another world, we were warm, personal friends. Only last September he visited in my home at Nashville, Tenn. We little dreamed that in a little more than two months his course on earth would be finished. He seemed to be in better health than he had been for some years. We discussed the presidential campaign, which was then pending, and the work of the next Congress, to which he was looking forward with much eagerness and interest. It is difficult for us to understand just why he was taken in the midst of his life of usefulness. The ways of Providence are often beyond our understanding.

He was a man of strong convictions. Holding as a Democrat an important position on the Committee on Ways and Means, he never failed to take a prominent part in its deliberations and to impress upon the House his views on tariff and financial legislation.

He was a kindly, sympathetic man. He was a good friend. He was always happy when he could do some one a service. And it was this attribute of his character which popularized him with all who knew him.

It may be truly said of him, Mr. Speaker, that he rendered the best service that was in him, that he was faithful to every trust imposed in him and that his life was not lived in vain. I am proud of his friendship and will always treasure the memory of our pleasant association during the years we served together in Congress.

The contemplation of the death of such a friend is always sad. It is difficult for us to understand just why one should be taken in the prime of life and in the midst of a life of usefulness and service to those about him. But it is consoling that we may look back and enjoy the memories of pleasant associations and feel that the world is better because our friend had lived. We are here but for a little while. Soon "taps" will sound for all of us. To render some service to those about us in our sphere of life; to measure up to the qualities and duties of a good citizen; to endeavor to make the world better and so live that there will be those who will deeply mourn our passing, should be the high aim of every man and woman. Death is not so frightful to one who has such a true philosophy of life; neither is it the end. For surely when such a life passes from this earth it passes on to a higher and better sphere of existence. This was the standard for which our colleague, WILL OLDFIELD strove, and that he succeeded in his high endeavor is attested by the fact that he died with the love and the admiration of all of his colleagues.

To his sorrowing widow, who was his chief inspiration, we extend our tenderest sympathy and rejoice that a grateful constituency has commissioned her to carry on as it did her husband in his lifetime.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, our deceased colleague, the Hon. WILLIAM OLDFIELD, from the State of Arkansas, was one of the strongest men who ever represented any district in the United States Congress. It was my pleasure to serve nearly 16 years in the House of Representatives with this distinguished man. According to my recollection, he served more than 20 years as a Member of the House of Representatives. He was a loyal Democrat, a great American, and a most useful citizen. To know WILLIAM OLDFIELD was to love him. On all occasions he had at heart the interests of the average man and woman in this Republic. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee he was an indefatigable worker, always looking out for the interests of the people. His able mind and eloquent voice on the floor of this House demonstrated his worth to his district, State, and Nation.

Mr. OLDFIELD won a high place in the councils of his party and among the statesmen of America. He was a great man, worthy of every trust that the people of Arkansas reposed in him.

He was a gentleman in every sense of the word—bold, fearless, courageous, and honest. He was a regular dynamo of energy, ready at all times to do battle for what he believed to be right.

He was a stalwart Christian gentleman, a devoted husband, and a true and loyal citizen devoted to the cause of his country. He will be missed in this legislative body but his works will live.

Personally I was devoted to my dear friend BILLY OLDFIELD. I knew his worth as a man, as a legislator, and as a friend. I have lost a dear personal friend, but feel solace in the fact that he is in the presence of his Maker in a better and happier world.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, upon entering the House at the extraordinary session of Congress of April, 1913, I first met the late WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, of Arkansas. His kindly reception and generous offer of service to me, a new Member, excited my interest and my appreciation of him.

Subsequently I was frequently in contact with him, and was often the recipient of his expanding consideration and personal friendship. He seemed to anticipate my official needs and desires, thus evidencing his knowledge of Members and his desire to serve them.

The procedure and the legislation of Congress, together with the success of the Democratic Party, held for him his deepest interest and most cherished ambition.

Mr. OLDFIELD was an intense partisan, but without personal hostilities, and his personal attachments and friendships were unhindered by partisan division or differences. His warm and generous nature resented such discriminations.

As suggested, he took the deepest interest in the business of the House, and was industrious in advising Members of the days on which important measures were likely to be considered. He endeavored to stimulate every Member of his party with a full sense of his responsibility to the House and to the country, and to this end he worked with an indefatigability which should excite the envy of every Member of the House. He gave to the House and to the Democratic Party throughout the country his most arduous labor and unsparing time, doing his work tactfully but manfully, without fear or favor, and finding his recompense in noble service and devotion to the Republic. He believed the Democratic Party to be a great institution for public good, essential to the maintenance of the American system, and that it should be so supported and expressed by its leaders as to attract the confidence of the people of the Nation.

Mr. OLDFIELD was much interested in the Interparliamentary Union, and especially in the work of the American group of this union, and as a consequence he was a regular attendant upon its sessions, and on one or two occasions attended the international conferences of this union. In his attendance upon the conference at Vienna it was my pleasure to be with him, and his genial companionship and personal consideration on this occasion will never be forgotten by me.

He had a great capacity for friendships. Of a sunny and happy temperament, eager to help, tactful and sincere, he made many friendships. I acknowledge in this public way my obligation for his kindly regard of myself, and his responses to official and personal requests made of him by me.

A sincere friend, a devoted patriot, a faithful public servant in and out of the Congress, wide sympathies for the struggling masses at home and abroad, he will not soon be forgotten, and somewhere and somehow the influence exerted by him will continue for the good of his friends and for the promotion of the best interests of the people.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the saddest day in the life of any man is when some relative or friend receives that irrevocable summons to appear before the Great Judge of mankind and of the universe and to account for their lives during their brief sojourn on this earth. We are all answerable to that inevitable call when it is served upon us, and can be prepared only by leading an honest, upright life, heeding the exhortation of the Master and holding the esteem and respect of our associates. It is customary to praise the virtues of our friends when death has overtaken them, but we should also show our appreciation while they live.

This afternoon we are met here at this hour set apart by the House to do honor to the memory of our departed comrades with whom we have associated in our common work for our country and our people. On such occasions we extol their virtues and acclaim their greatness, but, Mr. Speaker, no eulogy can magnify nor encomium enlarge the fine character and the exemplary life of the man in whose honor I speak this afternoon. In all my acquaintance in the different walks of life I have never known a better man than Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD. When I first came to Congress from out of the West he befriended me in many ways and was always my friend. He was of great assistance in more ways than can be told on this occasion. I often went to him for advice and counsel, and he always gave it kindly and wisely. He was the friend of everyone, and especially of the new Members of this great body.

No Member ever went to him for help and was turned away. If any assistance could be given, it was gladly done. Every Member of Congress was his friend. I shall never forget BILL OLDFIELD and never cease to do honor to his memory. It was an honor to be classed as his friend and always a pleasure to be in his presence. No person could dislike him, and no one that I ever knew had anything but praise for him. Such friends are indispensable to a successful life. He was one of the first men I became acquainted with on my first trip to Congress. He had a fine and lovable disposition possessed by few men. In his presence there was always joy and good feeling. When he entered a body of men, gloom disappeared and happiness abounded. If every man had such a disposition, what a different world this would be in which to live. The esteem in which his people held him told of their love and admiration for him. One of the ablest Representatives of one of our greatest States, he won his honors here by hard study, devotion to duty, his great capacity to make friends, by a keen brain, and a most thorough knowledge of the problems of state.

No words of praise and no orator's voice can portray his beautiful character, nor do justice to his honorable and useful life. Such an undertaking here I shall not attempt. The confidence and love of his constituents for him is told by the fact that he represented them in the American Congress for 20 years and no district was ever better represented. He came from the common people and always was glad to be counted as one of them. Positions of honor, influence, and power never lessened his zeal in their behalf nor closed his eyes to their appeal. When a measure that affected the great masses of the common people came before Congress, he was one of its most able and ardent advocates. A Democrat of the old school that believed in preserving the rights of the people, he always looked for the common good of the Government which he loved. A partisan in politics, he was always fair and was respected by all. Ungentlemanly advantage was unknown to his nature. He was a good speaker, an able debater, quick at repartee, and convincing in argument. With deceit he was unacquainted and met every man as a gentleman. No man loved his friends more than he, nor was more forgiving to those who might differ from him. He gave to every person the right to think and act for himself. This Hall and no building is large enough to hold all those to whom he had done a kindness or spoken a friendly word. He always saw the bright side, and kindness beamed from his eyes and dispelled the shadows of unhappiness and discontent.

BILL OLDFIELD was indeed an American nobleman who saw the good in people in preference to looking for other frailties. Human applause and earthly greatness could never cause him to leave his path of duty and devotion to his people. The passing of no man from Congress ever caused more genuine grief than when he left us to take a look at the other side, and as sure as man was ever conveyed to those Elysian fields across the river, I am sure that he is resting there at this hour. He loved his friends, and their faults soon faded from his view, but their virtues were painted eternally in his memory. As a Member of Congress, he was at all times in the forefront for his country's good. Partisan politics could never blind him to his Nation's welfare. His life is worthy of emulation by every boy in the land and his struggles against adversity may well be a guiding star to satisfy the ambition of every young man who desires to serve in high places.

As a member of the powerful Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives he exerted much influence in the framing of tax and tariff legislation. Regardless of who proposed a measure, he was free to oppose or support, as directed by a clear conscience and an honest heart. He was ever alert for the best interests of his district, State, and Nation. Many of his former constituents live in the district which I have had the honor to represent in Congress for the past eight years, and without a single exception they were his friends, as was every person who ever knew him. He was ambitious, as every American citizen is desirous of accomplishing something for the good of his family and his country, but mere approbation alone never actuated him, but he was impelled by that human desire to be of service to his fellow men. While man likes to hear his name sounded in the sweet accents of approval, my good friend BILL OLDFIELD was encouraged by higher aims and a nobler cause. His name is written high in the rolls of this House as one of the best men who ever served any constituency, against whom I never heard a word uttered, and in whose direction the finger of suspicion was never pointed. What a pity that all public officials can not serve as he served, with but one star to guide them, and that the star of public duty. Mind and character are the standard of American manhood, and my departed friend possessed both attributes to the highest degree. He was familiar with hardships and adversity and progressed to one of the highest positions within the gift of his people by industry, perseverance, and a strict adherence to duty. He knew what it meant to walk through the dark, damp tunnel of despair as well as leap the silver stream of happiness and success.

His life and acquaintance will always be a benediction to me and a friendship that I shall ever cherish as clean, pure, and honest. So much did I love him that it would be a great privilege to me sometime to be able to render some service to a member of his family. There is no friendship that I have cherished more and no acquaintance of more lasting remembrance. Nothing mean or low ever entered his mind, but his attention was centered on the higher things of life.

Mr. Speaker, I find some consolation this afternoon and on this sad occasion because I know my beloved friend BILL OLDFIELD—we all called him "Bill"—is resting in that palace where we will hope to finally rest, eternally and everlastingly, from the turbulent life of this world.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in contributing these words to the memory of our colleague WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, I speak with a feeling of genuine personal loss. We loved him because of his real human qualities.

The Federal Constitution provides that the United States shall grant no titles of nobility. The fathers who builded that great charter must have believed that nobility in our country should consist of the achievement of the individual in serving his fellow man. Measured by this American standard of character and service, our friend Mr. OLDFIELD was a nobleman.

In the vigor of young manhood he volunteered his services in the defense of his country in the Spanish-American War. Likewise in later life he threw his energies in a militant manner, as a legislator in the House of Representatives, into every measure and policy proposed for his country's welfare.

While we admired WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD for his vigor, courage, ability, and integrity as a statesman, yet we shall not allow these characteristics to submerge those even finer qualities of manhood which he manifested as a leader and lover of men. He possessed a magnetic personality endowed richly with a spirit of hospitality. He had a glad hand, a fine spirit of humor, and a word of encouragement for everyone.

The miracles of healing, the words of love, the daily acts of service of the Man of Galilee for mankind in distress, add great emphasis to the Master's philosophy that the "pathway to the throne of God is found in the hearts of men." WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD must have recognized this divine philosophy because his feet constantly traveled this pathway and found a joy in a rich fellowship with his fellow man.

He was also a true follower of his political patron saint Thomas Jefferson. With force and conviction he believed in the people and at all times tried to conserve their rights. Like Jefferson, Lincoln, and Bryan, Mr. OLDFIELD was proud to be a commoner. He hated sham and hypocrisy, and from the depth of his soul, believed that worth and character made the man. As a Representative he rendered great service to his State and Nation.

> Statesman, yet friend to truth; of soul sincere,
> In action faithful, and in honor clear;
> Who broke no promise, served no private end,
> Who gained no title, and who lost no friend;
> Ennobled by himself, by all approved.

Personally we feel enriched in having been associated with WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD as a friend and colleague. We treasure his memory as one who served faithfully and well. Shall we not then garner from his life a renewed inspiration, a deeper devotion to serve mankind, a more constant love for humanity, all of which was so dear to the heart of our friend who has gone on before.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, at such a time it is very difficult for me to adequately express my feelings.

Another of our colleagues has been called, and we are again confronted by the mystery and the majesty of death. Another great personality is unable to answer the earthly roll call, and his vibrant voice, so often and eloquently heard in this Chamber, is hushed forever.

WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, the man and the friend, has entered upon the journey from which the traveler never returns. He died at his post of duty on the altar of toil. In his unremitting application to every call for service he gave no heed to the limitation imposed on a greatly impaired constitution which raised a barrier that he was unable to pass without loosing the silver cord, and breaking the golden bowl of life. I feel that he knew this. In the strenuous discharge of his self-imposed duties as a Member of this House he was literally taking his life in his hands, thus deliberately shortening a career that promised much in usefulness to his constituency and his country and honor to himself.

He apparently counted a life that was lost in battling for the things he believed to be right, to be a life well lost. Our friend stood four square for his convictions. In his parliamentary combats he gave hard blows and accepted return like the gentleman that he was, but he was unfailing in his courtesy to his adversary, and never overstepped the bounds of courtesy. He was a keen, analytical, forceful thinker, and by unremitting study and research possessed a store of facts and figures, became an adept at repartee, and was a foeman worthy the steel of any man.

BILLY OLDFIELD, as we who knew him loved to call him, was loyal to his friends and to the causes he espoused. In their behalf he spared neither time nor energy, but expended himself with a zeal and a fervor that gave little or no heed to his health nor his interests.

These unselfish qualities of endeavor and loyalty were the means in large measure that brought to an untimely termination a great career.

Mr. Speaker, to-day we mourn the departure of a good, strong, brave, and clean man. No soldier upon the field of battle ever gave himself more freely to the call of duty. If to-day is better than yesterday and to-morrow will be better than to-day, it is because men like our friend lived and labored in his day and generation.

The eminent colleagues from his State on the Great Plains in this House, who worked side by side with him in the successful effort to bring glory and honor and prestige to the Commonwealth he served so well, will enumerate his achievements and his early struggles.

I well remember when I was first privileged to come to this great body to represent in part the State of New York, the friend I mourn in this inadequate tribute lent me his valuable aid in order that I might judge aright the duties of my great office and make a record for myself and the party to which I owe allegiance. He was a kindly, friendly, and patient mentor, the door of whose office was at all times ajar that I might enter for advice and inspiration. The friendly and cordial handclasp, the invitation to be seated, always assured me that I would leave his presence better equipped to meet the problem which had given me many anxious moments.

But such men are not dead; they live in the hearts of their countrymen. The verdict of history will be that he was notable in those qualities which go to make up the best and strongest characters and was a man of whom his State may well be proud. I doubt not that his grateful fellow citizens will long remember his services and that time will only make his memory the brighter.

Some writer once said:

> Every life, no matter if its every hour is rich with love and every moment jeweled with joy, will at its close become a tragedy as sad and deep and dark as can be woven of the warp and woof of mystery and death.

For them death is no tragedy deep and dark, for I know they believe that for him who suffers it is but the opening of a portal to the dawn of a grander, richer, more glorious existence, and that when the final summons comes to each of them in turn he may be sure that his loving comrades who have gone before will meet him with outstretched spirit hands to clasp again the hand of him they loved on earth and bid him welcome as he touches the unknown shore. And so believing, I say in all hope and in all reverence to my companion and my friend, "Good-by, good-by, until we meet again."

In the words of Mark Antony, mourning for his friend, the great Cæsar, let me say:

> This was the noblest Roman of them all.
> He only, in a general, honest thought
> And common good to all, made one of us.
> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, memorial services were held to-day for the deceased Members of Congress who have left us during the Seventieth Congress. Pursuant to the permission granted Members to extend their remarks, I desire to pay reverence to a man who during his life filled many positions of trust and honor in his native State and in the Nation. During the Spanish-American War WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD served his country with credit and distinction; entering the service as a private he was promoted to first lieutenant. He was elected to the Sixty-first Congress and served with distinction in Congress for 20 years. At the time of his death he had been reelected to the Seventy-first Congress.

Mr. OLDFIELD in the year 1925 became the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee of the House, where he wielded great influence in shaping the policy of his party in Congress and in the Nation. He was ever active in all party matters.

He was a sincere and firm Democrat, believing implicitly in the doctrines of his party and in the teachings of Thomas Jefferson that it is the right of the people to rule in the affairs of government. Mr. OLDFIELD was happy in the thought that to make man's future better meant a better government. Politics to him was not a desire for personal rivalry but rather an effort in the interest of a liberty-loving people for good government.

Mr. OLDFIELD was a man of the highest type of citizenship. He took a leading part in shaping the policy of his party and in tiding it to success in its activities in the lower branch of Congress; he was always fair and extremely courteous in his dealing with the opposition but firm in his position when he believed he was in the right.

Our late colleague represented the State of Arkansas, but his work in Congress gave him a much larger field of activity in the affairs of government. His work in behalf of his State was of a constructive character, and later in the broader field of the Nation he gave the best in him to the service of the people. By his early life and training in civil and military affairs he fitted himself so as to take his place in the business and life of the Nation in our time. His was a character of industry, modesty, and achievement of honors won with patience and careful effort.

He believed in his legislative work that the intelligence of our citizenship in the affairs of our Government, and their interest therein, should be maintained by a live, militant Democratic Party. To that end he spent much of his valuable time and gave energetic effort to the success of these ideals. He stood and fought eloquently for clean politics in the affairs of the Nation. It can not be said of him that he did not give the best and most fruitful years of his life to the service of both his State and the Nation.

This world is a better world because he lived and had his being in it. There are those in his State and in the Congress of the United States who will always cherish the memory of Mr. OLDFIELD as a friend. To labor and bring happiness to family and friends is the duty imposed upon us in this enlightened existence.

I can bear testimony in the six years I have personally known Mr. OLDFIELD that few men had combined in them the nobler qualities of mind and heart than had the deceased. His life was an inspiration to all to do better and to be faithful in the affairs of man and God.

The call has come for him, and while he passes from our lives he leaves the memory of his example and an inspiration to carry on the great work he laid down.

Other leaders have already taken his place with the inspiration he left to carry on the battle of life in the interest of the masses of people—that the rule of government shall not be harsh—and that all the people in an intelligent Government like ours shall be a part of and have a voice in the affairs of the same.

I believe that death had no terrors for WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, and that while he had not run the course that had been allotted to man, he was prepared to pass on, feeling that his work had been well done and that his fellow man felt as he did—that when the call comes we must be prepared to meet it and face our Maker.

On this occasion I feel that it is fitting to quote from one of Lincoln's favorite poems:

> Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
> Like a fast-fleeting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
> A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
> He passed from life to his rest in the grave.
> * * * * *
> 'Tis the wink of an eye, 'tis the draft of a breath,
> From the blossoms of health to the paleness of death,
> From the gilded salon to the bier and the shroud;
> Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Speaker, political life in our country is full of changes. We regret the absence of some who retire voluntarily and of others who are retired in the exigencies of political service, but such departures are recognized as liable to happen to everyone, and we hope that our paths will cross again. But inexpressibly more sad is the leaving of a loved comrade for that "bourne from whence no traveler returns." It is hard to believe that BILLY OLDFIELD has left forever the scene of his labors for his country. He seemed so strong, so vigorous, so energetic in the measures which he advocated so earnestly and with such sound common sense.

These qualities of mind and body carried him successfully through his educational and professional career. Early in life he began his public service and held offices of trust in his native State. Previously he had answered the call to arms in defense of his country and participated in the war with Spain. It is typical of the man that he enlisted as a private; and it is also indicative that he was awarded a commission before he was mustered out. What he did, he did with all his energy and he did it well. Later began his long service in Congress where he served for nearly 20 years.

Soon after coming to Congress I met him, and we were friends from the beginning of my term. He was always ready and willing to aid a colleague and would go to any trouble to do a friend a favor. He had the capacity for friendship to a high degree, and such men earn the friendship of others. He was intensely loyal to his friends. Loyalty is a quality upon which can be built a great character, but which, if not possessed, the whole superstructure is weak, even though the subject possesses other great qualities. He gave his friendship unreservedly; once a friend, he was always a friend and loyally aided in your labors.

He gave generously of himself, and with no reservations. If he agreed to do a thing, he did it with all his energy. As Democratic whip he came into contact with all the members of his party, and he never abused the attributes of that position, while at all times firmly, honestly, and energetically carrying out the orders of the leaders. He made a great success in his handling of this difficult position and was largely responsible for the legislative achievements of the minority party.

Then he was made chairman of the National Congressional Democratic Committee, and here his genius for organization had freer scope. He was a Jacksonian Democrat and he believed firmly in the principles of his party and the righteousness of its cause. In his opinion the country would be better served by the Democracy, and there was no room in his mind for disbelief in this conviction and no lack of energy and enthusiasm in his advocacy. Although his activities caused him much physical discomfort in the feverish days of the last campaign, he doggedly and determinedly "carried on," giving of all that was in him for the success of his party.

He will be missed from the party councils, where his sound common sense and good political judgment were invaluable in the discussion of party affairs; he will be missed in the Halls of Congress, where he used his talents in behalf of his country; but most of all will he be missed in the hearts of his friends, who loved him.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, in no field or sphere of human endeavor and activity can the qualities of unfaltering courage and direct aggressive leadership become more valued or of greater public service than in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Our departed and lamented friend, WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, possessed and effectively exemplified these qualities. He was not only true to his convictions at all times, but on any and every occasion he was ready to fight straight through to establish and maintain the principles for which he stood and to which his party was pledged.

Under our system of government by political parties, in a legislative capacity one must be loyal to his party in order to be a statesman, since our legislative accomplishments in the main are results of organized efforts and actions by the major political parties.

Accepting this view, Mr. OLDFIELD rendered splendid service to his country as a statesman and was a most valued aid to his colleagues in respect to those measures for which his party had made pledges to the public.

The source of my personal sorrow is in the loss of a true, constant, and loyal friend over the entire period of my service in the Congress. I feel sure that he, as other friends who have passed beyond, would have us feel that—

> Death has not taken all away,
> These friends are with us still to-day;
> Each one of us still carries on > Something of those whose souls have gone.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the privilege of paying tribute to the memory of my lamented friend the Hon. WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD.

He who lives in the hearts of those he leaves behind does not die.

The memories of happy associations with Congressman OLDFIELD, affectionately known on this floor as BILLY OLDFIELD during his 20 years of service, will continue to live in the hearts and minds of all his colleagues.

One of the first Members of the House of Representatives I met on coming to Congress was Mr. OLDFIELD, whose genial and cordial manner drew me near him, and throughout our service together I held for him a most affectionate regard. I shall always hold in grateful memory not only his many helpful suggestions, but his never-failing courtesies.

In politics, while Mr. OLDFIELD was an intense partisan he was also an intense patriot. He loved the ideals and institutions of our Government, and in his official life he always sought to preserve them. His personal popularity in the Congress was not confined to his party, but on both sides of the aisle, as well as in the official life of Washington, he was held in high esteem. The performance of his duties as a Representative in Congress was characterized by that ability and untiring zeal which made him one of its outstanding leaders.

While mourning the loss of our distinguished colleague to-day we are greatly consoled in having amongst us, as his successor, his gentle and elegant wife, who has within her short service as a Member of the House of Representatives won her way into the hearts of the entire membership of this House. She did not seek membership in this body. The friends of her lamented husband urged that she not only serve his unexpired term but again insisted that she accept the nomination for the long term. This was not only a compliment to her but it attested the love, the esteem, and confidence in which Mr. OLDFIELD was held by a constituency who had commissioned him to represent them here for a long period of time. It is fortunate, indeed, not only for the district she represents but for us who miss the companionship and the able service of her distinguished husband that she has come to be with us.

Amongst the first of all human virtues is loyalty. Mr. OLDFIELD possessed a sense of loyalty that was unsurpassed. Loyalty to his country as a national legislator was his first thought, and no man was more loyal to his friends. His untimely death was a distinct shock and loss to his country, to the State of Arkansas, and particularly to that congressional district which honored itself by honoring him and which he served so loyally. He fought the fight; he finished the course; he kept the faith.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, known among his colleagues as BILLY OLDFIELD, was a native product of the State of Arkansas, not only by birth but education and political activity. Born February 4, 1874, he received his foundation for substantial advancement in the common schools of his county and his A. B. degree from Arkansas College at Batesville.

As a lawyer he stood high in his profession, became prosecuting attorney and when war broke out with Spain was among those first to enlist in the service of his country.

In Congress he was among the leaders of the Democratic Party, holding the very important position as a member of the Ways and Means Committee. He was an able debater, and in speeches before the House of Representatives his addresses were clear, instructive, and showed a full knowledge of the subject under discussion.

I knew him for many years. He was a man of most lovable disposition and endeared himself to his colleagues on both sides of the aisle because of his courtesy, kindness, and affability. There is no doubt in my mind that he hastened his death by his overzealousness in the interest of his party's success.

As chairman of the Congressional Campaign Committee, he was ever alert and on the job. When he went to New York to help conduct the campaign from the Democratic headquarters, he was constantly at his desk and never missed an opportunity to promote the welfare of Democracy and the success of the ticket.

He will be greatly missed in the House of Representatives by all who knew him. Each one seems to fit into some particular niche in that great legislative body, and BILLY OLDFIELD certainly by his tact, knowledge, and disposition had his own peculiar place.

It is a pleasure to all of us to know that his constituents loved him and his wife so well that they have sent Mrs. OLDFIELD to the House of Representatives to succeed him. It does not seem possible that BILLY OLDFIELD has departed from our midst, and those of us who have been associated with him for so many years will ever treasure his memory.

CHARLES LEE FAUST

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, CHARLEY FAUST was beloved by his colleagues. Our association with him in the Congress was a pleasure. He has gone, like other beloved ones, from our midst.

The milestones into headstones turn, and under each a friend.

The best evidence of his greatness and worth comes from those at home, as expressed in an address by United States District Judge Merrill E. Otis, delivered at St. Joseph, Mo., Friday evening, January 4, 1929.

I include it as a part of my remarks.

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY FEDERAL JUDGE MERRILL E. OTIS AT ST. JOSEPH, MO., JANUARY 4, 1929, AT SERVICES HELD IN MEMORY OF CONGRESSMAN CHARLES L. FAUST

Here in St. Joseph, where we knew him best and loved him most, he was never Mr. Congressman, but always and to everyone CHARLEY FAUST—genial, handsome, friendly CHARLEY FAUST. For everyone he met as he walked up and down our streets he had a smile and kindly words genuine as gold. There was not one of us but felt that he was never thinking of himself but of us only, of us as individuals, of our hopes, our interests, our aspirations, thinking in what manner, by what service he could contribute to the bringing of greater happiness to us and ours. He entered into the very hearts of us, and when he died it seemed that each of us in part had ceased to be.

We look back now over the life of this dear friend and none of us remembers ever to have heard from him one word of praise of self, one word of criticism of another. Never once in public address or private conversation did he so much as hint at any part he played. The pronoun "I" was not in his vocabulary. The graciousness of his helpfulness to each who sought it was never lessened by an express or implied "I have done this for you."

In all this district which so splendidly he represented not one human being felt envy of CHARLEY FAUST. Does a father envy the success his son achieves? He rejoices in it, rather. It is his own success. It was so we thought of the success of this man we chose to represent us. We were rising as he rose. Our hopes, not his, were shattered when he passed away.

It is hard for us to think that he is gone and will return no more. True, we read the news, we met the funeral train that bore him back, we saw through tears the wasted form beneath the covering of flowers, we saw the cortege pass as the snowflakes softly fell, pass along our streets, across the river to the old home, but we can not quite grasp it yet, that Charley will not soon be here again to make us glad with that warm handclasp of his and that old sweet smile.

I have been reading recently of those mysterious empires of the Orient at that time of which we of the Occident speak as the Middle Ages. Now and then in those Middle Ages some European traveler, some heroic Franciscan friar, some adventurous Marco Polo, at periods separated from each other sometimes by a hundred years, would penetrate the recesses of the distant East, observe its life and its achievements, and, painfully returning, write out accounts of what he saw. Only these far-separated glimpses (and they were imperfect glimpses) did the West catch of the East for a thousand years. Yet during all that long, long time the life of the East and its civilization uninterruptedly went on. So, hidden from every other, is the life of each man. Of him concerning whom we think we know most of all, really we know little. Who undertakes to describe another's life undertakes that which it is not possible to do. I can describe my own life, but I will not, you yours, but you will not. Each buries in his heart his greatest tragedies, his deepest sorrows, his thwarted hopes, his most trying struggles, his real story—and no other knows that story that he may tell it.

How superficial any attempt of mine to tell the story of the life of CHARLES L. FAUST. That he was born in Ohio; that in his childhood he was brought to Kansas; that he attended school in Highland; that he studied law at Lawrence; that he came here to practice his profession; that for four years he was city counselor, discharging with fine ability the duties of that office; that in 1920 he was elected to the National Congress; that he was four times reelected; that he was a member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee of the House; that at 49 years of age he was stricken with a fatal illness and passed away—what an inadequate picture of the man does such a bare recital of the more conspicuous events in his career afford.

Why he was successful was no mystery. Why he was beloved was no mystery. Why he would have risen, as undoubtedly he would have risen, to a place of the greatest power and influence in national affairs, that would have been no mystery, but he was a mystery to me. For hours at a time I thought about him while he lived and for hours at a time I have thought about him since he died. I owed him a debt I never could begin to pay, but because I longed to try to pay it I strove to know his heart's desire, but I could never find it out. What was deep within his spirit I did not know. Some sorrow that a smile concealed, some ache within that no word made known, some premonition that no sign gave hint of, a loneliness amidst a multitude of friends, these I thought I could perceive as through a dark glass dimly, buried in his heart.

Why he was successful was no mystery. Before he was successful, already he had the appearance and the bearing of success. And those are attributes which of themselves, if supported by other qualities, contribute to success.

In part he was successful because others were vitally interested in him. Others were interested in him because more and more they came to know that he was vitally interested in each of them and in each man and woman and every child in the congressional district he so splendidly represented. Whoever wrote a letter to CHARLEY FAUST who did not immediately receive reply and service? No task was too small for him and none too great. No man in the community was so unimportant that FAUST did not treat him with the same deference he would accord the Chief Magistrate of the Nation and no woman so lowly in the social scale that she did not receive from him as fine a courtesy as he would show a queen. His most casual passing by was like warm sunshine breaking through dark clouds.

Why he was successful and beloved was not a mystery. In Washington as well as here he was beloved by all who knew him. President Harding and President Coolidge each not only valued his counsel and advice but felt for him the warmest friendship. Members of the Cabinet greeted him by his given name. Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States were happy to spend an hour in his pleasant company. His colleagues in the House crowded the anteroom of the Chamber where he lay ill, made anxious inquiries concerning him, felt deepest solicitude that he should soon be well again. His seat in Congress had become secure at last. Never again would it have been seriously contended for by another.

Each of 5,000 could make a speech to-night relating some unselfish service done for him by FAUST. It would be a better eulogy than that I can speak with trembling lips.

Each knows best his own relations with this friend of all. I best know mine.

I can see him now as a dozen years ago I saw him when, a young lawyer, a desperately struggling young lawyer, I went to his office in the Corby Building on a mission of supreme importance to myself. How awkward I must have been. How my knees were shaking, my voice trembling, how difficult it was for me to say to the presentable gentleman who sat across the desk from me: "Mr. FAUST, I would like to be first assistant city counselor." How he put me at my ease, with what kindness he spoke concerning my aspiration, what encouragement he gave me. How clearly I remember now every detail of that scene.

I can see him now as every morning he came into the city counselor's office in the old city hall with a friendly greeting to each of us who made up his official family. If we did anything worth mention he saw to it that we received not only full credit but all credit. If anything was done well, he had words of the kindest praise. If anything was done ill no criticism, no faultfinding came from him.

I can see him now in that meeting so memorable to me which was held one night in the summer of 1920 at the Highlands Country Club. There were gathered the leaders of the party from the several counties of the fourth congressional district. The object of the meeting ostensibly was to decide on a candidate for Congress. I have always thought that the real object of the meeting was to eliminate as mercifully as could be and in as kindly manner as was possible one who was not the best fitted for the race, but who aspired to make it. I can see Charley, as he was called on and can hear him say, "I am for the other man for this opportunity," and he was genuinely and sincerely for the other man.

I can see him now, as I did years afterwards, when one afternoon I was sitting in the court room of the Supreme Court of the United States awaiting the argument of a case, and he tapped me on the shoulder, beckoned me to the hall, and said: "Son, how would you like to be a Federal judge?"

I can see him now in a hundred scenes that are precious in my memory, as each of you can see him in as many that are dear to you.

I can see him now, and when my eyes have grown so dim that I can no longer see anything at all, I shall be able yet to say, "I can see him now."

As he lay there dying, and I think he knew that he was dying—the shadow already was fast sweeping toward the field of consciousness, as he lay there, he beckoned to his side his friend. I think it was not this friend alone whom he thus summoned, but in him each of us and all his friends. In his all-comprehending recollection then there was not one forgotten. Across his countenance flitted the old sweet smile. No word fell from his lips, only his smile spoke the affection his great heart felt. Nearer to his side he drew his friend. Tightly he clasped his hand. Gently he caressed his cheek. And so, holding to his breast us all with that one arm in which a little strength yet lingered, he bade us farewell 'till we shall meet again. And so, he fell asleep.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I knew CHARLES L. FAUST and highly regarded him. He was an able Representative of the fourth district of Missouri in the northwest corner of the State. A native of Kansas, he came to Missouri and practiced law in St. Joseph where he made his home. He succeeded

Charles H. Booher, a Democrat, who served that district for 12 years. It was known as a Democratic district until CHARLEY FAUST seems to have brought it into the Republican column. He came to Congress—elected in 1920—in the landslide that left at home so many Democratic Congressmen.

While other districts of Missouri returned in 1922 Democratic Representatives, the fourth district of Missouri remained loyal to CHARLEY FAUST. His great personal popularity and unquestioned ability and great service in Congress brought to his support many Democrats who believed in him—were his personal friends and recognized his fitness for congressional service, and by increasing majorities he continued to be elected. In the November election of 1928 he was elected by over 10,000 majority. He worthily executed his trust. His ability was quickly recognized and he was given membership on the Ways and Means Committee, and after I returned to Congress in 1922 we served together on that committee. Our offices in the House Office Building were near, and we saw much of each other. I held him in the highest regard. If he had consented, he would have been nominated and elected United States Senator from Missouri to succeed Senator JAMES A. REED, who was retiring from the Senate, but he preferred to stay in the House and occupy the prominent position he held in committee and party counsels.

His sudden illness came as a shock to us all and his passing away a great regret to all his associates and many friends. His ability, his service, his modest usefulness was recognized by all. He made friends. His courteous bearing, his fine presence, and capable service were marked by all. Continued service and a long life seemed a certainty. He looked the very picture of health. There was universal regret at his death. Congress, his State, and his country have suffered a distinct loss. We were close friends. I valued highly his friendship and sorrowed at his going. His many virtues will be remembered. His remains were taken to St. Joseph, attended by a committee of Congress, where services largely attended were held in memory and tribute to his worth and character and distinguished service. Then his body was taken to his old home in Kansas, the home of his parents, his childhood, and youth, nad there interred to await the resurrection morn.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the fourth district of Missouri has lost a great friend and the Members of Congress have lost a loved and respected colleague through the death of CHARLES LEE FAUST. The cloak of life has been taken from him, but in the hearts of his friends he still lives on. His was a record of devotion, a record of service, and a record of loyalty to his country and his constituents. No call for help ever came to him that was not heard. He seemed to live for the good he could do others, and his greatest pleasure in life came through service.

I find an interesting sketch of Mr. FAUST's life in the following letter from Mr. Elliot Marshall, of St. Joseph, Mo. Mr. Marshall was probably one of the closest and dearest friends Mr. FAUST ever had.

He was born in Bellefontaine, Ohio, April 24, 1879, and would have been 50 years old on his next birthday. Bellefontaine was in the congressional district that the late President Harding represented when he was in Congress. His parents were Wilson S. and Ella M. Faust. They moved West when he was a baby and located on a farm near Highland, Doniphan County, Kans. He started life as a farmer boy, plowed corn, milked cows, made hay, and did all the chores that fall to a farmer's son. He attended the public schools at Highland, and after being graduated attended Highland College.

For two years he taught a country schcol in Doniphan County to earn money to pay his way through college. Later he entered Kansas University, from which institution he was graduated in 1903, receiving the degree of LL. B.

His striking physical appearance attracted attention wherever he went. Seeing him for the first time a person would find it difficult to resist inquiring as to his identity. His loving, genial ways won him friends on all sides, and to the day of his death there were men in all walks of life who knew CHARLEY FAUST well enough to call him by his first name.

Mr. FAUST attended the Presbyterian Church. He was a thirty-second degree Mason of the Scottish Rite, and a Shriner. He was a member of the St. Joseph Chamber of Commerce and a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, serving that organization as exalted ruler one term, 1919–20.

The city of St. Joseph and the entire fourth district heard with grief and sorrow on November 28 that Mr. FAUST was stricken with thrombosis, but encouraging reports came from his bedside giving out hopes for his recovery. In a few days reports came that he was losing ground, and on December 17, 1928, at 11 p. m., the fatal and dreaded word was received that our Congressman was no more. The whole city was thrown into grief, for everyone felt that CHARLEY FAUST belonged to them personally, and everyone loved and respected him and felt honored by having him their Representative in Congress.

Typical of the expressions of sorrow by various organizations in the fourth district of Missouri is the following resolution from the Missouri Association of Letter Carriers, of St. Joseph, Mo.:

Whereas it has pleased the Almighty in His infinite wisdom to remove from among us our worthy and beloved Congressman, CHARLES L. FAUST; and

Whereas the district has lost a faithful servant and the postal employees a true friend: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Branch 195, N. A. L. C., extend to the bereaved family our heartfelt sympathy in their sorrow; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the family, a copy to the House of Representatives, a copy to the Postal Record for publication, and a copy be spread on the minutes of the branch.

As the new Member of Congress from the same district which has been so faithfully represented by the man we are honoring to-day, I feel both the honor and the responsibility which is placed upon me at this time.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I would feel that I had neglected to perform a duty I owe to the memory of our dear friend, CHARLES L. FAUST, were I not to add a brief tribute to his memory.

Well do I remember my first meeting with him. It was at Savannah, Mo., where we were both attending the funeral of the Hon. Charles Booher, whom he succeeded in Congress from that district.

From our meeting and acquaintance on that day down to the end of his life, CHARLEY FAUST and I remained close personal friends. While we were of different political affiliation, we frequently conferred on nonpolitical matters concerning which we might be of mutual assistance.

He was genial in temperament and a delightful man to meet. He made his constituency a good Representative, and his popularity with the people is indicated by his successive elections to Congress by substantial majorities.

He received political preferment in his home city before being elected to Congress, and his popularity was ever on the increase, which was indicative of a satisfactory and splendid official service.

He was in such favor with his party, and his services so recognized, that he became a member of the most influential committee in the House—the Ways and Means—thus showing that his merit was duly appreciated and his ability recognized.

His death has removed one of our ablest and most popular Members, and in his death Congress and the country have sustained a severe loss. His departure is sincerely mourned as a national loss, and among those who associated with him, and those who knew him best, his memory will be cherished as a loyal and delightful friend, a congenial associate, a patriotic and devoted servant to his people, and a lover of his country.

The public have a very meager understanding of the strain to which a Member of the House or Senate is subjected. Those Members among you who have been serving here for even a few terms have seen time and time again the health of your comrades shattered, and you have seen them enter an early grave because of the often serious injury to health the services in this body have brought. Under the strain of the labors of political life the health of CHARLEY FAUST gave way and he surrendered to death.

By education, experience, and training of our colleague, based upon his native ability and strong and charming personality, he was equipped for what he became—an ideal Member of Congress.

He deeply respected the wishes of his constituents, and labored manfully to comply with their desires, so far as he could do so without doing injustice to his judgment as to what was right and best.

But I think no fear of political consequences or personal welfare ever turned him from what his own best judgment approved.

But our friend and colleague has passed on to a better world. He sleeps the sleep of the just. He was a good man, a good citizen, a loyal friend, and an able legislator, and in honor of his memory may I say:

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days!
None knew thee but to love thee,
Nor named thee but to praise.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, the news of the untimely death of CHARLES L. FAUST came to me as a great shock and left me with a sense of profound sorrow and personal loss. I feel honored in calling him friend, with all that the word implies to our close but too brief friendship.

CHARLES L. FAUST died young in years but rich in a useful life, leaving a host of friendships of his own making. He was in the high noon of a splendid intellect, still in full flow and vigor of a perfect manhood. Stricken in mid-career with his work yet scarcely begun, and the laurels bound thick about his brow as green as when gathered in the early morning of his first success. There was no pretense in his make-up; hypocrisy was foreign to his nature. He was honest and plain. He met every issue, big or small, squarely and acted without reservation. He knew not of expediency and never attempted to learn.

In his public career he followed the dictates of a conscience that always responded to the call of duty and the noblest impulses of true manhood.

He was loved by all Members of the House regardless of politics. He did not talk a great deal but thought much, as the poet has said:

> We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
> In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
> We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
> Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

One had to know CHARLES L. FAUST well to sound to its uttermost depths the virile force and power of his many-sided character.

His friendship was marvelously true. It was the ruling trait of his character. With him to be once a friend was to be always such; to him the voice of distressed friendship was as the voice of God.

A noble heart pulsing with a love for all humanity has been laid to rest where:

> Love shall stand guard for thee,
> Friends without number,
> Bereaved and disconsolate over thee weep;
> Sweet be thy dreams.
> Untroubled thy slumbers;
> Tranquilly, peacefully, restfully sleep.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, it is one of the crowning glories of our free institutions that the humblest and most obscure citizen may aspire to and attain exalted station in the public service of our Nation. Under our system of government, public honors and public responsibilities are not reserved for the highborn, rich, and favored classes, but any young man of substantial ability, painstaking industry, and well-balanced ambition, may establish himself in the confidence and affections of the people, and on being called to high positions in the Government, may make a valuable and lasting contribution to our national life.

Our late colleague, Hon. CHARLES L. FAUST, of the fourth Missouri district, was a conspicuous example of the poor boy who made good and won worth-while honors in the service of his country. Born on a farm and reared in the great agricultural Commonwealth, by diligent application and the exercise of liberal intellectual ability, he rapidly rose above his environment and demonstrated his ability and capacity for efficient public service.

Since 1903 he has been an honored citizen of St. Joseph, Mo., where he engaged in the practice of law, and where he was city counselor for a number of years before his election to represent his district in Congress. He had a well-developed legal mind, and early in life set himself to the task of—

> Mastering the lawless science of our law,
> That codeless myriad of precedent,
> That wilderness of single instances,
> Through which a few by wit and fortune led,
> May beat a pathway out to wealth and fame.

And right well he succeeded in the practice of his profession. He exemplified its exalted ideals and scrupulously observed its highest standard of ethics.

He was elected to the Sixty-seventh Congress in 1920, and reelected to the Sixty-eighth, Sixty-ninth, Seventieth, and Seventy-first Congresses in a district in which his political party was in the minority. Men of opposing political faiths loved and trusted him because they knew he was honest, candid, able, courteous, fair, and dependable. His was a short but busy life. He was remarkably free from sordid and selfish motives. As a Member of this House, he won and firmly held the respect, esteem, and confidence of his colleagues. He was not spectacular but substantial and sturdy. He was my friend and, although it is a melancholy privilege, I join with my colleagues in paying a sincere tribute to his memory.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, Hon. CHARLES LEE FAUST faithfully represented the fourth congressional district of Missouri, and when news of his death reached his constituents there was genuine regret among all the people, regardless of class or politics. Handsome in appearance, clean in his life, ever courteous and considerate, he was one of the outstanding and most popular Members of the national House of Representatives. He did not seek the spectacular. His best work was in committees, and especially in the powerful Ways and Means Committee, of which he was a valued member, and in which he would have played a much larger part but for his untimely passing. Many there are among the present Members of the House who can recall some kind deed at the hands of CHARLEY FAUST, as he was so often lovingly referred to. One of his greatest pleasures was in helping a friend, and to him even the stranger came in this class.

Although unmarried, Representative FAUST was essentially a home man. Home ties meant much to him. Just before the 1927 holidays we were discussing Christmas. Mr. FAUST was asked if he planned to go back to the old home for the holidays. His reply was to the effect that so long as his mother lived he never failed to go home for Christmas, but that since her death he knew that it would be so lonesome that he did not care to go back.

Yet through one of those strange happenings which we call fate, or what we will, the body of this beloved Representative was borne back to the old home just before Christmas, 1928. Beautiful and appropriate services were held in the city of St. Joseph, metropolis of the district which he served. Eloquent were the words of tribute spoken by the minister, but not more meaning than were the thousands of good things said by the home folks who had known this kindly and considerate man. Apparently the entire city joined in the last tribute. It was genuine and heartfelt.

Still in the prime of life, and with a future filled with brilliant promise, it seems difficult to understand why Representative FAUST should have been called from his chosen career. Well done, though, had been his work. A man of splendid personality, a citizen of the highest character, and a real representative of the people, he reflected credit upon the Congress.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the death of Representative CHARLES L. FAUST, so affectionately known to us all as CHARLEY FAUST, removed from our midst an outstanding character, and his death is a distinct loss not only to the people of the fourth congressional district of Missouri, which he so ably represented, but also to the State at large, as well as the Nation.

Some hardly realize why the passing of a Member means so much to the citizenry of his State. It is the position he has attained in the Congress and his willingness to serve the interests of not only his own community but the State that makes his loss so great.

Missouri, housing great industries, had in Mr. FAUST a member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, willing and anxious to serve the people, always responding to their call for assistance when revenue or tariff bills were under consideration.

In the next session of Congress, and at this time when hearings are being held on the proposed new tariff bill, those who have appealed to him in the past to see that fair play was extended to their products well understand the great loss the people of Missouri sustained by his death. Rarely is a Member advanced to an assignment on the Ways and Means Committee until he has served several terms in the House.

Five times elected from a district, which for many years sent a Democrat to Congress, is evidence of his popularity among his constituents. Had he so desired he could have had the nomination for the United States Senate in the last campaign, and, as the nominee of his party was elected by a large majority, it will be seen he refused a seat in that great legislative body because of his love for the people of the fourth district. He declined to be a candidate for the Senate, stating he would prefer to remain in the House.

Like everyone who came in contact with Mr. FAUST, I cherished his friendship.

Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS. Mr. Speaker, one of the first Members of Congress whom I met when I entered this body at the beginning of the Seventieth Congress was the late CHARLES L. FAUST, whose character and public service we memorialize on this occasion. To me the duty which the hour imposes is a labor of love, and I avail myself of this opportunity to pay my tribute.

I was especially attracted to him by his genial and gracious manner, and from the time I met him until his death I considered him one of my best friends in Congress.

He was patient and painstaking; informed himself about the works of Congress and the various departments, and all matters which related to the business of the Government. He was always eager for facts and went to the bottom of every question with which he had to do. Keen and thorough, he was always prepared on every subject which he discussed. Served faithfully on one of the most important committees of the House—the Ways and Means Committee—and his opinions and judgment were highly respected by his colleagues.

The public esteem in which he was held was evidenced by the mourning at his death. I feel that the House and our good State, Missouri, has lost in him an extremely valuable Member of Congress.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, a strong and capable man was taken after a brief illness from the comradeship of the House of Representatives when our dearly loved friend, Hon. CHARLES L. FAUST, answered the final roll call. For several years he had been a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, an active and able participant in its deliberations. His purpose was to serve the public welfare. His legal training and experience, and judicial attitude of mind made him a valuable Member. Thoughtful, studious, deliberate in judgment, truly patriotic and careful in his decisions, he greatly revered his country, his State, and his district. He possessed a personality that men admire, and drew friends to him with a strong attachment. The absence from our deliberations, of one in whom we were accustomed to rely, is a serious loss which we deeply deplore.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, it is for those who knew CHARLES L. FAUST more intimately and for a longer period of years than I knew him to pay to him and his memory that degree of tribute which he richly deserves.

It has been my good fortune, and one that has afforded me genuine pleasure, to have known Mr. FAUST since his election to Congress in the sixty-seventh session, and more intimately since his election to the Ways and Means Committee a few years ago.

He was a man possessed of an unusual personality; quiet, dignified, outwardly reserved, he was, withal, a "man's man." Possessed of scholarly attainments, a keen analytical mind, he displayed a degree of ability which, had he been spared to the country, would have left its impress upon the pages of history.

To know CHARLEY FAUST was to prize his friendship. I know of no man in this House who was more beloved by its membership than our departed friend and colleague; this was equally true of his home people, and it was a distinct tribute to the high esteem and the love which his constituents had for him that he was elected and reelected to Congress as a Republican from a normally Democratic district. It may truly be said that the fourth district of Missouri was a "Faust" district.

Stricken suddenly in the prime of manhood, in his untimely death the House of Representatives has lost a beloved colleague, the State of Missouri has lost a distinguished citizen, and the Nation has lost an able legislator and a real statesman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to attend the funeral of our late colleague, the Hon. CHARLES L. FAUST, in his home city of St. Joseph, Mo. The entire community was in mourning. Men, women, and children streamed all forenoon to the church where his last remains lay in state. A tremendous concourse of people attended the funeral services, which were marked by evidences of personal loss and grief seldom witnessed even in the case of public men. The memorial addresses spoke in tender and simple words the deep affection and regard which all felt for our departed colleague. It was plain that he had been the outstanding citizen of the community and that his reputation rested upon his solicitude and kindness for all with whom he came into contact. This testimony bore out the estimation for him of his colleagues in the House. Quiet, considerate, affable, he won not only the esteem but the affection of all who came within the radiance of his cheerful presence. In the House, he gave constant attention to matters of legislation and in the Committee on Ways and Means, where I had the honor to sit by his side, he followed the hearings and discussions with the closest attention. His own observations were always pertinent and effective. His death was a great shock to us all. He was stricken in the apparent power of his manhood, when many years of usefulness and success seemed to lie before him. His relatives and friends have our deepest sympathy. We share with them a genuine personal loss, but shall also cherish with them the memory of his noble character and distinguished career.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in triumphal reelection, CHARLES L. FAUST returned to Washington in November last. He was the acclaimed idol of the district which he represented in the House of Representatives. The people of that district loved him because he loved them and served them.

A fine, big man, physically and mentally and morally, was my friend, CHARLES L. FAUST, an Apollo among men, a son of Jove himself. He walked all the ways of life in thoughtful dignity. Reserved and courteous; sincere of mind and kindly of heart; a rich friend.

I first met Mr. FAUST shortly after coming to Congress in 1921; we came to Washington at about the same time. A mutual friend, Lurton H. Stubbs, now of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, but formerly of St. Joseph, Mo., happened in Washington and brought us together, quite insisting that we were so much alike in ideas and ideals that we must be friends. It needed no urging to make us such in fact. He soon seemed to me like a younger brother. I found no faults in him during all the years of our associations. He was never a demagogue, never a poser, sincere, earnest, honest in his public office as well as in his private life.

He thought so much that he talked but little on the floor of the House, for the most thinking men are apt to do the least talking. I am told that all his speech making in the eight years of his service was limited to one effort, which filled hardly a dozen lines in the RECORD. What he asked for in that brief speech was voted unanimously, such was the confidence his fellow Members reposed in him.

Before our mutual friend Mr. Stubbs left Washington he added another former St. Joseph man to the list of my friends, Levis C. Hamilton, who had made so much money that his doctors had to prescribe retirement from active business for him. In St. Joseph he had been one of the coterie of friends who idolized Mr. FAUST. Mr. Hamilton had a car and a chauffeur, and so we three made many journeys together on holidays and Sundays to Annapolis, to Baltimore, to Gettysburg, to Harpers Ferry. Rare days of friendship and profitable short journeys into the patriotic history of our country. It was on these trips that I learned to know the real Mr. FAUST. We talked of many things that we had in common, for each of us was born in the mid-west country.

In the memories of such intimate friendly contacts CHARLES L. FAUST is enshrined for me; I can not and must not mar them by the usual eulogies of politics. What he did in public life was all safe and sound and right and true, but what he was as a man and a friend was something finer still.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, CHARLES L. FAUST was one of my intimate friends on the Ways and Means Committee, where we had served together for nearly six years. In our daily contact I found him to be a gentleman of the old school, courtly and gracious and possessed of a desire to serve his country and his constituency to the limit. He was a splendid lawyer and had the added advantage of a judicial temperament. His decisions on legislative matters were made after careful consideration of the facts and were the result of sound conclusions. A man with such a mind was of inestimable value in his service on this great committee.

CHARLEY FAUST had a genius for making friends and retaining their admiration and devotion. I deplore his passing, and yet I rejoice that I knew him and had the honor to serve with him.

I am reminded of the paragraph by Essary regarding the frequent losses of our membership:

> The hand of change touches heavily the House and Senate each election year, reminding all observers that if life itself is uncertain, the tenure of elective office is more uncertain. Old and familiar faces which may have seemed as permanent as the Ionic columns of the Capitol vanish. Death and defeat take heavy toll, and the transitory nature of greatness is manifest.

EDWARD JOHN KING

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I am gratified to have the opportunity to take advantage of the action of the House in granting unanimous consent for the extension of remarks on this occasion concerning EDWARD J. KING. EDWARD JOHN KING was elected to this House in 1914 and took his seat March 4, 1915, in the Sixty-fourth Congress.

He has since been elected in seven other Congresses, namely, the Sixty-fourth to the Seventy-first, and had he lived until March 4, 1929, he would have seen 14 years' service in this body. Only the following Members now living are now Members from Illinois in this body, namely: RAINEY, of the twentieth district; SABATH, of the fifth district; BRITTEN, of the ninth district (admitted March 4, 1913); and DENISON, of the twenty-fifth district; and WILLIAMS, of the twenty-fourth district, both DENISON and WILLIAMS having been admitted March 4, 1915, the same date as KING, and therefore both his seniors only by the accident of having their names precede him alphabetically. KING was thus the senior of all but 4 of the 27 Illinois Congressmen.

Prior to Mr. KING'S entry into this House he had served four terms in the lower house of the Illinois General Assembly, in other words, the house of representatives, having been elected to the forty-fifth general assembly in November, 1906, and reelected to the forty-sixth in 1908 and reelected to the forty-seventh in 1910 and reelected to the forty-eighth in 1912. Prior to his service in the State legislature he served for two years—1893–94—as city attorney of Galesburg, having always been a lawyer in full practice since his graduation from law school.

His earlier education was first in the public schools; second, in the high school in the city of Galesburg; and, third, in Knox College, the famous institution to which he was always intensely loyal, the old college having a history of exalted and conspicuous and inspiring patriotism, its president for many years having been Hon. Newton Bateman, who was elected State superintendent of public instruction on November 6, 1860, the same day on which Abraham Lincoln was elected President.

Knox County, of which Galesburg is the county seat, contains not only Knox College and a number of other fine educational institutions but is also full of newspapers and shops and mills, making it one of the most important centers in Illinois.

The young EDWARD KING, elected city attorney at the age of 26, found himself entering public life in a community of learning and labor, tolerant and in sympathy with the oppressed of all the world, and to-day a great throng of organized labor and a host of railroad men and a strong battalion of colored citizens, as well as men acquainted with school and college and the classics, all pay homage to him and his memory.

Naturally, he was a fighter. His father and nearly all his male relatives were soldiers under Lincoln, and so was his grandfather's grandfather under Washington. KING was absolutely independent. I know this because I was well acquainted with the four Illinois General Assemblies of which he was a member. The first of them was a general assembly presided over by Edward J. Shurtleff, who was elected by a combination of the Deneen men with the Yates men in that general assembly, KING'S running mate for the legislature in the ensuing general assembly, the forty-sixth, being Hon. Burnett M. Chipperfield, afterwards Congressman at large from Illinois; and he had another interesting experience when the people elected a Democratic general assembly in 1912, and the house of representatives had 72 Democratic members while the Republicans had only 52. In the fighting and floor work of that session, which lasted from January 8 to June 30, KING was in his element.

His service here is known to you all; and, in fact, is an open book.

Nobody ever controlled EDWARD JOHN KING.

Nobody ever did the thinking for him. He had only one rule. Whenever anything came up he just asked himself the question, "Is it right?" and if he thought the answer was right, he acted accordingly day and night with all his might.

I have not the slightest doubt whatever but that his district would have continued to send him here the rest of his life had he lived. I must remain silent as to the number of times when he was right or wrong, the number of times when he was absent or present, the number of times when he differed with his committee—the great House Committee on Banks and Banking—of which he was vice chairman when he died. These matters are nearly all of record. I have not the absolute knowledge as to these things.

But I know that he was industrious and conservative and that the work of his office was done, and well done. He rarely let the sun go down on an unanswered letter, and the number of pension bills and public-building bills and bills for relief of various citizens is impressive.

In addition, he was much on the floor and in debate; for example, in the Seventieth Congress he spoke and was attentively listened to on the subject of arms embargo, the legislative appropriation bill, the judges' salaries in the Philippine Islands, the subject of rubber, the loan to Rumania, the Senate tariff resolution, the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and many other things, such as granting consent of Congress for extension of time for construction of bridge across the Mississippi.

It is impossible to do what I would like to have done, namely, to quote a paragraph of each of the important speeches delivered during the 14 years.

I content myself with referring to one only:

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 5, 1922, under the heading of "Statue of Abraham Lincoln," will be found nine pages containing the remarks of Mr. KING and the petitions and resolutions offered in evidence by him, and in the report by the Committee on the Library in support of a resolution to reerect the statue of Abraham Lincoln upon its original site, Mr. KING, in addition to many other things, discussed the influence of popular marbles in general and the Abraham Lincoln statue in particular. Its erection in front of the courthouse in Judiciary Park, its removal therefrom, and the reasons why it should be reerected. The argument showed deep study and intensive application and dealt convincingly with such questions as proportions and drapery and attitude and the question what is artistic and what is not.

The splendid success of Mr. KING'S effort is well known, and his devotion and dedication to the subject excited the admiration of the whole membership of the House, and the approval of President Harding, and the Library Committee, headed by Senator FESS and by Governor LUCE and of the most powerful press.

I refer to this one speech because time prevents the discussion of others, and it would be impossible to quote from them all.

In saying farewell to our fallen comrade, and in extending our sympathy to the surviving wife and son, I take the liberty to add as a part of my remarks certain paragraphs from the argument of Mr. KING on the Lincoln Statue, as follows:

John Ruskin says:

"The sculptor does not work for the anatomist but for the common observer of life and nature."

The art of the ancients reached down into the common understanding of the people and its plea to them concerned the highest and noblest aims of their country. Xerxes, the Persian conqueror, perceiving this silent appeal and influence, dismantled the statuary and pulled down the temples in Greece, and the first measure Darius took to suppress insurrection among his victims was to raze their temples and statuary.

On the other hand, recognizing the influence of the marble, Augustus had statues erected in honor of the heroes of the Empire who deserved the recognition of their country. His theory, and it seems a wise one, was that such a course was not only an acknowledgment of a debt owing by the nation but stimulated others to like heroic acts for the Empire. To elevate the warrior, the founder, or savior of a nation in the imagination of the people above the ordinary grade of people is a custom which has been handed down from generation to generation from the earliest periods of human history. By word of mouth, by pencil, by brush, by the chisel, has this work of immortalization gone on.

And so this exquisite white figure more than 53 years ago stepped into its position on its pedestal in front of the temple of justice and in the plaza of the city, fresh hewed, in the feelings and thoughts of the time, to become the object of admiration of the masses. Criticized? Yes; and so was the disk thrower by Myron, now and for centuries regarded as perfection in marble, and by contemporaries was declared a distortion and an overelaboration. Its artist creator in penury? Yes; but Phideas himself, known as the "sculptor of the gods," died in prison, an exile from Athens.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to know ED KING very well. We served for years together on the Banking and Currency Committee of the House and upon several occasions situations arose with reference to legislation which came within the jurisdiction of our committee that gave me a chance to test his strength of character. From my association with him and from my observation of his conduct when his character was submitted upon more than one occasion to very severe test, I came to admire him and respect him very much.

He was one of the most sincere men that I ever knew. He was clean, honorable, upright, truthful, industrious, and patriotic. His courage under trying circumstances was remarkable. In fact, I regarded him as one of the most courageous men of the House. He had his ideas and his convictions, and he had the courage not only to express them but to defend them. He was a big-hearted man who loved humanity, got genuine joy out of service to the people who honored him. Instinctively, he sprang to the defense of the common man when his rights were threatened, and just as instinctively he stood against special privilege. He believed in the right of men to govern themselves because he had faith in the ability of men and women to handle their own affairs and work out their own destinies.

He was an ardent Republican, but among his closest friends were the Democrats of the committee and in the House. He was a great Republican, but a greater American. While he stood with his party organization and was true to the principles of his party, he was not bound by either if, in his judgment, they involved any surrender of his Americanism or his duty to his constituents.

The State of Illinois is a great State and has contributed to this Nation many men who have rendered signal service, but of none may it be more justly proud than of ED KING, of the record he made as a public official, and prouder still of the clean life he led as a private citizen. I think we may fairly apply to him the lines once spoken by the poet of a great Englishman:

Statesman, yet friend to truth; of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear:
Who broke no promise, served no private end,
Who gained no title, and who lost no friend.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Grim Reaper has again invaded the Halls of Congress, and Representative EDWARD J. KING, of Galesburg, Ill., has passed to the Great Beyond.

Mr. KING was another example of the poor boy who worked his way through school and by sheer force of character and determination made a success in life.

I knew him first when he was a member of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

In his service there he showed marked ability to work, to study, and to achieve.

His record in that legislative body brought him favorably to the attention of the people of his congressional district, and he was selected as the Republican standard bearer for Representative in Congress. He was elected by a large majority, and his service here, as in the State legislature, showed such a marked devotion to duty that he was reelected seven times.

His business and professional life were no less successful than his political life.

He was a lawyer of outstanding ability and a banker of sterling worth.

In the House he served on the important Committee on Banking and Currency, and at the time of his death he was ranking Republican member of that committee.

Mr. KING was a man of modest and kindly disposition, and his conduct among his colleagues was such as to make friends and keep them. His work here, as elsewhere, was not of the showy sort. He was not given to self-aggrandizement.

He seemed to be imbued with the idea that he was the hired man of his constituents; that he was sent here to do their work for them, and he proceeded to do it as carefully, as conscientiously, and as industriously as though it were his own, which, indeed, it was.

In the passing of Mr. KING I feel that I have lost a good friend; that his district has lost a good servant; and that our country has lost a wise and energetic Member of its Congress, the greatest legislative body in the world.

Mr. BUCKBEE. Mr. Speaker, it is with infinite sadness that I am called upon to help as best I can to commemorate the memory of my dear friend and colleague EDWARD J. KING, of Illinois. I know that it is difficult to express one's innermost feelings on such an occasion as this, and so must be content only in saying that, however I am able to express myself, sorrow is deep in my heart.

Mr. KING was known and loved by his people and by all his friends, both here and back in Illinois, and a man to do this is a man of sterling qualities. When one has such a man for friend he learns the true value of real friendship—and it is just such friendship that makes life worth while.

His even tenor, his steadfast purpose, his sound judgment was known and admired by all. His courage, too, was known; it was dauntless, and it was steady and strong as the mighty oak. He faced all obstacles with steady eye, and unflinchingly he went over the stones upon his path with ease. Such was the character of the man, the man as he was known.

Statesman, yet friend to truth; of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear;
Who broke no promise, served no private end,
Who gained no title, and who lost no friend;
Ennobled by himself, by all approved;
Praised, wept, and honored by those he loved.

How wonderfully eloquent those words are—and how fitting for this man, my friend!

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me I extend resolutions adopted February 18, 1929, by the Illinois delegation on the death of Hon. EDWARD J. KING.

On the 17th of February, 1929, Hon. EDWARD J. KING, our beloved colleague, died at his home, Washington, D. C., in his sixty-first year. Had he lived until the 4th of March he would have served in the Congress of the United States 14 full years. His record as a city attorney of the city of Galesburg, three terms in the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, and the remainder of his life in the Congress of the United States is a most enviable one as a legislator, a gentleman, and a devoted citizen. In his death we, the colleagues of his State, lost a friend and a conscientious comrade. His ability, his integrity, and his friendship appealed to the members of his delegation. The Congress of the United States has lost a valuable Member of the House of Representatives; always at his post whether in health or indisposed. We who knew him best saw him many times on the floor of the House conscientiously attending to his duties when we knew he should have been under a physician's care. And now our friend EDWARD J. KING has passed to the Great Beyond and those of us of the Illinois delegation in Congress who are left behind desire to extend to his wife, family, and friends our profound sympathy and tender solicitude in their bereavement.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, Illinois has suffered severe losses in the House of Representatives of the Seventieth Congress. First came the shock of the passing of the dean of the delegation, the Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, of the first district. Then followed the death of the Hon. HENRY R. RATHBONE, Representative at large, and shortly before adjournment came the sad news of the demise of one of our senior Members, the Hon. EDWARD J. KING, of the fifteenth district. Thus 3 out of 27 Members have gone to their rewards during a single term of two years; in fact, within the space of a single year.

Congressman KING was beloved by all his colleagues. His genial, cheerful disposition, even in the midst of severe illness, endeared him to everyone. His high and noble character, his devotion to duty and responsibility, and his deep sympathy and kindliness in his relations with his friends were marked characteristics of a personality that grew constantly in the esteem of his associates as they learned to know and appreciate his true worth. His heart went out to the great mass of the people; those who toil the hardest and get the smallest returns. He loved the memory of the great commoner of Illinois, Abraham Lincoln, the martyred President, who left such deep recollections among the people of Galesburg, the home city of our late colleague, in one of his famous debates in that locality with Stephen A. Douglas. Mr. KING therefore fought strenuously for the restoration of one of the historic statues of President Lincoln in the National Capital. His earnestness and seriousness in this, as in other efforts of his legislative career, so impressed the House that a seemingly hopeless task was fully achieved. Independence of thought and action marked the congressional labors of our late colleague, while he responded faithfully to the real obligations of party solidarity. Highly important and successful service in the Illinois Legislature gave him valuable training for his work in Washington, and he employed his opportunities here to the best of his ability and for the highest welfare of his constituency, his State, and the Nation. In brief, he was "a good and faithful servant," who well merited the rewards of success and appreciation which came to him in ample measure.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, the other day our colleague and good friend EDWARD J. KING, of Illinois, the ranking Republican member of the Banking and Currency Committee, slipped away to the other side. His ready smile and genial, kindly nature, which made friends for him wherever he encountered his fellow men, will be missed by us who knew him well. Although for the last few years Mr. KING was fighting the odds, he was not willing to delegate his work, and made a brave effort to be on hand to do his part for his constituency and the country at large. The fact that he was a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth General Assemblies of Illinois, and was elected to the Sixty-fourth Congress and reelected to each succeeding Congress, including the Seventy-first, bears evidence of his faithfulness to duty and of his untiring efforts in behalf of his constituents. We shall miss him.

SENATE

THURSDAY, February 21, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Eternal God, who countest the nations as the dust of the balance and takest up the isles as a very little thing, who hast put down the mighty from their seat and exalted them of low degree, bless, we beseech Thee, our land with all manner of good, and write the law of justice on the hearts of its rulers and people. Heal the divisions in the household of Thy sons and daughters, and make all their mutual strivings to cease.

Stay the injustice that binds heavy burdens upon the weak, and relieve those who suffer under the wrongs and cruelties of their fellow men. Let Thy fatherly pity and protection rest upon the poor, the sick, and the sorrowful; and may the whole world be filled with the light of Thy truth and the glory of Thy kingdom. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. VANDENBERG presented the following resolution adopted by the State Senate of Michigan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Resolution 30

Whereas the Department of Michigan, the American Legion, is to-day informed from Washington that Congress is making no provision at this session for adding the 300 beds needed by the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 100, at Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich., while giving 500 more beds to Chicago; and

Whereas United States Veterans' Hospital, No. 100, is the only Government hospital for World War veterans in Michigan planned for only 450 beds, this hospital has to-day over 670 patients, while over 100 more eligible veterans are on the waiting list, helping to crowd Michigan's private and State institutions, and new cases are developing every month: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the State Senate of Michigan, in regular session assembled, again appeal to Congress for adding these 300 beds to United States Veterans' Hospital No. 100, by providing funds therefor at the present session; and that copies of this resolution and appeal be sent to the Michigan delegation in Congress, to the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau at Washington, to the national legislative committee of the American Legion at Washington, and to the chairman of the Veterans' Committee at Washington.

Mr. MOSES presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Whereas it has come to the attention of New Hampshire that the State of New York is planning to have the States of Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Massachusetts invited to take part in the observance of an anniversary commemorating the doings of an officer from this State during the Revolution;

Whereas there occurs this year the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Sullivan expedition, which was projected by Gov. George Clinton and Commander in Chief George Washington and authorized by Congress;

Whereas this successful military enterprise was participated in by officers and troops of New York, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Massachusetts;

Whereas the Sullivan expedition weakened the Indian alliance with the English, cut off supplies of food, gave protection to frontier settlements, opened the western part of the State for settlement, and helped to win for the American Republic the rich interior of the continent:

Resolved, That the honorable Postmaster General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be issued 100,000,000 postage stamps, of the denomination of 2 cents each, commemorative of the Sullivan campaign of 1779 in New York and Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Postmaster General of the United States and to the Senators and Members of Congress from the State of New Hampshire, properly authenticated by the clerks, respectively, of the Senate and House.

Mr. WARREN presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

TWENTIETH LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF WYOMING.

House of Representatives Enrolled Joint Memorial No. 2, memoralizing Congress to expressly authorize the assessment, taxation, and collection of taxes upon property in private ownership situated within the boundaries of the Yellowstone National Park.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized as follows:

"Whereas the Yellowstone National Park was created and the boundaries thereof were defined by act of Congress dated March 1, 1872, as amended by act of Congress dated May 7, 1894, and as so created and established includes within its boundaries areas of the States of Wyoming, Montana, and Idaho; and

"Whereas in the act creating Yellowstone National Park and providing rules and regulations therefor no special provision has been made authorizing the assessment and collection of taxes upon property in private ownership included within the boundaries of said park; and

"Whereas there now exists in private ownership a large amount of property situated within the boundaries of said Yellowstone National Park aggregating millions of dollars in value; and

"Whereas the effort of the State of Montana to tax property in private ownership in the Yellowstone Park has resulted in extended litigation, and has resulted in a decision authorizing the assessment and taxation by the State of Montana and the political subdivisions thereof of the property in private ownership included within that portion of the Yellowstone National Park which is located in the State of Montana; and

"Whereas the various acts of Congress establishing the several national parks, including Glacier National Park, Sequoia National Park, Yosemite National Park, Mount Rainier National Park, and Rocky Mountain National Park, each expressly authorize the taxation of property in private ownership situated within the boundaries thereof, and no good reason exists why such law should not be applied to the Yellowstone National Park; and

"Whereas any endeavor on the part of the State of Wyoming to collect taxes upon property in private ownership, situated in that portion of the Yellowstone National Park included within the boundaries of the State of Wyoming, will result in extended litigation which can all be avoided by an appropriate act or amendment to the present act of Congress to specifically authorize the taxation of property, which is in private ownership within the Yellowstone National Park: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That we hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States of America to pass an act or to amend present acts of Congress to specifically authorize the taxation of any property in private ownership which is included within the Yellowstone National Park; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this concurrent memorial be forwarded to the Wyoming Senators and its Representative in the Congress of the United States."

MARVIN L. BISHOP, Jr.,
Speaker of the House.
FRANK O. HORTON,
President of the Senate.

Approved at 9.54 a. m., February 14, 1929.

FRANK C. EMERSON, Governor.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I present a joint memorial passed recently by the Wyoming Legislature in connection with the purchase of the site and buildings of old Fort Laramie and the establishment of a national monument at that point. Among the many forts established on the western plains and in the Rocky Mountain territory it is probably true that Fort Laramie exerted the widest and most definite influence upon the protection of emigrants crossing the plains, the signing of treaties with the different tribes of Indians, and the final settlement of the West than any one of our famous frontier posts. Established in 1834, it is by this fact associated with nearly a century of the Nation's history. Situated upon the old Oregon Trail, it is now very near the line of one of our Federal highways, and already thousands of tourists are annual visitors to this site. It is to be hoped that the Government can be induced to provide funds for the purpose of properly dedicating it as a national monument.

I ask that the resolution may be read and referred to the Public Lands Committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
TWENTIETH LEGISLATURE, STATE OF WYOMING.

Enrolled Joint Memorial 1, memorializing Congress to purchase, restore, and preserve old Fort Laramie and set it aside as a national monument

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized as follows:

"Whereas old Fort Laramie, located in the North Platte Valley in Wyoming, on the route of the old Oregon Trail, is the most noted frontier post of the old West, where thousands upon thousands of immigrants paused for protection and supplies as they trekked their way westward across the plains of the great West to establish a new empire; and

"Whereas this old fort, to which there is more historic sentiment attached than to any other spot in the West, is fast decaying and should be preserved to posterity in order that future generations may see it and be inspired to emulate those sturdy pioneers who passed that way: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That in order to accomplish this purpose Congress be requested to appropriate a reasonable sum to purchase the old fort and grounds and to restore and preserve this noted spot in the West as a national monument; and be it further

"Resolved, That the house of representatives of the twentieth legislature, the Senate concurring, do hereby strongly urge favorable action by Congress on this matter, and that copies of these resolutions be submitted to the Interior Department of the United States, to the National Parks Commission, and to each of the Members of the Wyoming delegation in Congress."

FRANK O. HORTON,
President of the Senate.
MARVIN L. BISHOP, Jr.,
Speaker of the House.

Approved at 9.52 a. m., February 14, 1929.

FRANK C. EMERSON, Governor.

Mr. KENDRICK also presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming favoring the passage of legislation to amend the law so as to specifically authorize the taxation of any property in private ownership which is included within the Yellowstone National Park, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. (See joint memorial printed in full when presented to-day by Mr. WARREN.)

PROPOSED TARIFF REVISION

Mr. WATSON. I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD a statement relative to points to be emphasized in the proposed revision of duties on agricultural imports with the object of presenting it to the Finance Committee when it reaches the consideration of the tariff. I ask that the statement be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POINTS TO BE EMPHASIZED IN THE PENDING REVISION OF DUTIES ON AGRICULTURAL IMPORTS

We have requested permission to present this brief to your committee because we feel that some very important features affecting the revision of duties on agricultural products can hardly be given too much emphasis.

The first of these is that the present duties are not in fact protective, even in those cases where increases have been made by advice of the Tariff Commission and by proclamation of the President.

This is sufficiently proved by the two tables appended giving the figures of actual imports of competitive farm products for the fiscal years June 30, 1927, and June 30, 1928. The values of these imports are $2,173,000,000 and $2,161,000,000, respectively. These figures are obtained from the Department of Commerce.

Our many contacts with farmers in all parts of the United States, supported by the weight of testimony before your committee, convinces us that the rural population wishes a schedule of tariffs which are in fact protective.

That is to say, an effective tariff bill will be one which will result in reducing the annual imports of competitive farm products from more than $2,000,000,000 a year to a small fraction of that sum.

Unless this is brought about within a reasonable time after its passage, the new tariff can hardly be called a success.

What farmers need, and in our opinion are justified in asking, from the deliberations of your committee and the Houses of Congress, is a substantial monopoly of their own domestic markets.

Your committee need not, in our opinion, fear the results of such an exclusion of foreign products from our markets on the prices paid by the consuming public. An increase of duty on a given product will not necessarily mean that the price of that product will advance an equal amount. In many cases the price to the consumer will not advance at all, and may even decrease.

This is because the ultimate price to the consumer is determined by the general economic law of supply and demand. No agricultural product can possibly secure such a monopolistic position in our markets that the law of supply and demand can cease to operate.

What is asked, therefore, is that the products of our farms be given such tariff protection that the price of each product may at all times find its true and just level, as fixed by the production of the farms and the consumption of the public, without the interference of imports from foreign countries of differing standards of living.

The rural population is further convinced, in our opinion, that the existing schedules of duties on farm products are substantially below those which are now generally given to manufactures.

What is needed is an increase of agricultural duties to a substantial parity with those on manufactures; and it is obvious that any increases which your committee may think proper to make on manufactured goods must be taken into consideration in fixing the rates to be placed on agricultural products.

This, however, is subordinate, in our opinion, to the general principle that the agricultural duties shall be such that the domestic market shall belong exclusively to the American farmer, up to the full extent of his ability, present or prospective, to supply it.

The other point we wish to make is the urgent importance of completing a tariff bill and putting it into effect at the earliest possible moment.

It is incorrect to assume that the products of American farms come to harvest in the summer or autumn, and that a bill which became law by September, for example, would thereby be effective on 1929 crops.

The products of the farms are already going into the markets. They will continue to do so every day, every week, and month from this time until the year ends. The flow of farm products is in fact continuous.

We respectfully ask the committee to bear in mind, therefore, that every day that passes while a new tariff is being drafted sees additional millions of farm products go to market insufficiently protected, or not protected at all.

We fear that a half of the total year's production of 1929 must go unprotected into consumption, even with the best speed that the Congress is able to make. We ask that your committee will not permit any unnecessary or avoidable delays.

UNITED STATES PATROL BOAT "CG–295"

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Commerce Committee certain correspondence and a newspaper article, in the nature of a protest, received by me from a citizen of New Jersey whose boat was stopped by shots from the Coast Guard. It appeals to me as reprehensible.

There being no objection, the correspondence was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CUTTER FIRES ON YACHT OFF PUNTA RASSA—VISITORS HERE INDIGNANT AT FEDERAL SHIP'S ACTION

Indignant over the action of United States patrol boat CG–295, which fired twice across the bow of their yacht, H. H. Work and W. P. Letchford, of Palm Beach, plan to protest against Commander Swain with the Treasury Department. The rum chaser fired on their cabin cruiser Kadilla, near Punta Rassa, just as they were preparing to enter the Caloosahatchee.

The affair took place Saturday when the Kadilla, with Mr. and Mrs. Work and Mr. and Mrs. Letchford aboard, were cruising up the channel off Punta Rassa. The Coast Guard boat approached the private yacht and fired two shots across her bow without giving a warning of any kind, according to statements made by the owners to-day. They expressed their indignation to Commander Swain of the Government boat and informed him that they planned to report the affair at Washington, feeling that their lives had been needlessly endangered.

Commander Swain stated that his men were on the lookout for a 45-foot cabin boat reported to have aliens aboard.

Mr. Work and Mr. Letchford made inquiries at Punta Rassa and were informed that theirs was not the first boat to be treated in a similar manner. They said that people at Punta Rassa were forced to leave the beach when the patrol boats appeared, due to the danger of shells.

The Kadilla has been tied up at Ireland's dock since Saturday and the party are stopping at the Royal Palm Hotel. They had planned to cross the State in a smaller sea skiff but gave up the trip when they were informed that sand bars blocked the canal channel. Mr. Work is an official in the Standard Oil Co. and makes his winter home in Palm Beach. They will return to the east coast by motor in the morning.

JANUARY 28, 1929.

COMMANDING OFFICER,
United States Coast Guard, St. Petersburg, Fla.

DEAR SIR: I wish to make a formal complaint against Coast Guard cutter 295, commanded by a Mr. Swaine or Swayne.

Last Saturday, January 19, 1929, I was going up the Caloosahatchee River in my 48-foot cabin cruiser, towing a 27-foot fishing skiff, flying the New York Yacht Club flag, as well as my private insignia, when, without any warning, at 11.15 a. m., Coast Guard cutter 295 fired two shots across my bow.

It seems to me that such a procedure was totally uncalled for, as I was proceeding up the river at less than 8 miles an hour, and a most casual inspection through binoculars would convince anybody that we were not rum runners or running aliens. Their excuse was that they were looking for a boat which resembled mine carrying 22 aliens.

Upon arriving at Punta Rassa and Fort Myers I found that several other boats had been molested in the same way. I also learned that about six months ago a Coast Guard cutter even fired at a United States lighthouse tender.

It is so serious that the people in Punta Rassa go out and call their children off the beach when a boat comes in, as they are afraid the Coast Guard will start firing and endanger their children's lives by ricochetting bullets.

I would very much appreciate a reply from you expressing your opinion of what I consider an outrageous procedure. I shall also take this matter up with the Treasury Department in Washington when I go north some time in February.

Yours very truly,

HORACE H. WORK.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES COAST GUARD,
St. Petersburg, Fla., January 31, 1929.

Mr. HORACE H. WORK,
South Ocean Boulevard, Palm Beach, Fla.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of January 28 making a formal complaint against Boatswain Arthur J. Swain, the officer in charge of the CG–295 relative to two shots being fired across the bow of your cabin cruiser when you were proceeding up the Caloosahatchee River on January 19. In this connection you are advised that the CG–295 repeatedly sounded its whistle and that no attention was paid thereto, and consequently the only recourse to bring your vessel to was the firing of a shot across the bow.

Boatswain Swain states that when you were first sighted there were no flags flying from your boat. Boatswain Swain further states that upon coming alongside he explained the reason why the shots were fired.

The base commander does not agree with you that this was an outrageous procedure, as Boatswain Swain was carrying out his duties.

Respectfully,

C. G. ROEMER,
Lieutenant Commander, United States Coast Guard,
Commander Section Base 21.

FEBRUARY 6, 1929.

C. G. ROEMER,
Lieutenant Commander, United States Coast Guard, Base 21, St. Petersburg, Fla.

SIR: I am in receipt of yours of the 30th ultimo in reference to my complaint in regard to action of Boatswain Arthur J. Swain firing two shots across the bow of my boat as I was going up the Caloosahatchie River on January 19.

I wish to take exception to your statement that CG–295 repeatedly sounded its whistle, as it is my understanding that these boats are equipped with nothing but a Klaxon horn, which you know could not possibly be heard with two 180-speedway motors running at 900 revolutions.

I also wish to take exception to Boatswain Swain's statement that there were no flags flying when he first sighted my boat. My flags were hoisted at 8 o'clock and I was fired upon at 11.15.

Before I take this matter up with the Treasury Department at Washington when I go North on February 16, I should like to have your opinion on why Swain was not on the lookout, for he must have seen me at least a half hour before I entered the Caloosahatchie River. All that would have been necessary for him to do would have been to start up his boat and come across and block my entrance to the channel, making the firing of two shots entirely unnecessary.

Yours truly,

HORACE H. WORK.

DEAR MR. EDGE: Have as yet received no answer to this letter.

H. H. WORK.

ADJUSTMENT OF NORTHERN PACIFIC LAND GRANTS

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, as a member of the joint congressional committee appointed to investigate the equities between the United States Government and the Northern Pacific Railway, I submit a report (No. 1845) from that committee, accompanied by a bill which I ask may be placed on the calendar.

The bill (S. 5855) to alter and amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, and to alter and amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to issue its bonds for the construction of its road and to secure the same by mortgage, and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1870; to declare forfeited to the United States certain claimed rights asserted by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or the Northern Pacific Railway Co.; to direct the institution and prosecution of proceedings looking to the adjustment of the grant, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

EIGHTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Judiciary Committee, I am instructed to report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 16658) to amend sections 116, 118, and 126 of the Judicial Code, as amended, to divide the eighth judicial circuit of the United States, and to create a tenth judicial circuit; and I submit a report (No. 1843) thereon. I am directed by the committee by a unanimous vote to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the House bill amended by the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. It is the House bill, amended by inserting in it a provision for another place for the holding of court. That is the only amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether its consideration will lead to any debate?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it will. It is really an emergency matter.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator withdraw his request if it does lead to debate?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska if the bill is now amended to provide for an additional place of holding court at Kansas City?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; in the eighth circuit.

Mr. BRATTON. Otherwise the bill is just as it passed the House?

Mr. NORRIS. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLEASE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

JUDGE FRANCIS A. WINSLOW

Mr. NORRIS. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 425) providing for an investigation of Francis A. Winslow, United States district judge for the southern district of New York, and I submit a report (No. 1844) thereon.

The joint resolution provides for authority to a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House to investigate charges that have been made against a United States district judge in New York. Inasmuch as the House is not a continuing body, they must have authority of law to hold hearings on the matter. They desire to get ready for the new Members in the extra session. The joint resolution simply provides that authority. I can not conceive that there is any possible objection to it. I ask in this connection that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report of the committee is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 1844, 70th Cong., 2d sess.]

Francis A. Winslow

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. J. Res. 425):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the resolution (H. J. Res. 425) providing for an investigation of Francis A. Winslow, United States district judge for the southern district of New York, having had the resolution under consideration, report the same back to the Senate with a favorable recommendation.

The object of this joint resolution is to give the House of Representatives authority to act during the time intervening between the adjournment of the Seventieth Congress and the assembling of the Seventy-first Congress. The House of Representatives, not being a continuing body, makes it necessary for the passage of a law giving the committee named authority to act after the adjournment of the present Congress. The joint resolution is in the nature of impeachment proceedings and the House of Representatives has sole authority under the Constitution to act in such cases, and the only object of the resolution is to give such committee of the House of Representatives authority to act after the Seventieth Congress has adjourned. This joint resolution will have that effect, and the committee sees no reason why the Senate should not give its consent to the procedure requested by the House of Representatives.

Mr. NORRIS. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the joint resolution.

Mr. BLEASE. The clerk need read no further. I object.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether consideration of the joint resolution will take any time?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; it would have been passed by this time if I had not been interrupted. It simply gives the committee of the House authority to act during the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BLEASE. I object to its immediate consideration. I understand it is nothing in the world but a personal attack being made by a certain party because this judge happened to be a little polite to one attorney, and this man's prejudice leads him to believe there was a little too much politeness. I object.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I could not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. BLEASE. I have been informed that this is a personal matter, that somebody whose name I will not call thinks this judge has been a little too polite to a certain lawyer there whom this man hates. I do not believe in that kind of legislation and I object.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a proceeding to assist the House in making the investigation which under the Constitution they will have to make anyway.

Mr. BLEASE. I know, but I get my information direct and do not have to go around the corner for it. The man from whom I am getting my information is on the inside of the whole transaction and he knows on what it is based. This is not a thing in the world but prejudice. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

Hale Sypher case; (2) the Eli Ayers case; (3) Choctaw Citizens case, fees and expenses from 1904 to March 4, 1907; and (4) Choctaw-Chickasaw tribal taxes; having been considered by the United States Court of Claims in case No. 33996 but final judgment was not entered, the court holding in these said items it had no jurisdiction, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. BLAINE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 224) providing for a special examination of Sergt. Walter F. Choinski for appointment as second lieutenant of Infantry, United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask that the bill (S. 5399) to amend the laws relating to the United States Tariff Commission be recalled from the Committee on Finance and indefinitely postponed, and that I be permitted to introduce a bill in lieu of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and the bill will be indefinitely postponed. The bill now introduced will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 5853) to amend the laws relating to the United States Tariff Commission was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PENSION TO MARY FRANCES M'CONNELL

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16878) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and so forth, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BROUSSARD submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the "Naval Observatory, including $2,500 for pay of computers on piecework in preparing for publication the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac and in improving the tables of the planets, moon, and stars," from $174,380 to $178,560, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 16714, the naval appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE AMERICAN FLAG

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 334), as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War issue forthwith appropriate orders preventing the flying of any flag or pennant on the same staff or in any other manner above the flag of the United States of America, or colors representing the same, on any vessel or building or at any other place within their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. SACKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I object to the present consideration of the resolution. It will undoubtedly take considerable time. I am very anxious to go ahead with the naval appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over, under the rule.

INVESTIGATIONS BY THE FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 335), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized to sit during the sessions of recesses of the Seventy-first Congress at such times and places as they may deem advisable; to make investigations into internal revenue, cus-

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 322) submitted by Mr. JONES February 7, 1929, to amend Rule XXXVIII by providing for the consideration of nominations in open executive sessions, except in certain cases.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is necessarily away on account of a death in his family, and so I ask that the resolution may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over without prejudice.

RESERVE BANK RATES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution (S. Res. 327) submitted by Mr. SHIPSTEAD February 12, 1929, requesting information concerning agreements with foreign banks relative to Federal reserve bank rates.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have asked the Senator from Minnesota to let that resolution go over without prejudice. I understand he is willing to do that. It is necessary for me to leave the Senate Chamber in a few moments.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I agreed to have the resolution go over without prejudice, because I understood the Senator from Kansas would not be here this morning. If the Senator from Kansas can assure us there will be a morning hour soon, I ask, if he so desires, that the resolution go over without prejudice.

Mr. CURTIS. It is the intention to have another adjournment very soon, following which, of course, there will be another morning hour.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Under those circumstances, I shall be very glad to have the resolution go over without prejudice.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of yesterday entitled "The Nation's Health."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

THE NATION'S HEALTH

The bill introduced by Senator RANSDELL to create a national institute of health is not on the preferred calendar of the Senate and can therefore not come to a vote at this session, except by unanimous consent. But any Senator who would obstruct its consideration, save for the most valid of reasons, would be taking upon himself a responsibility measurable in terms of human life that might be saved by the service for which the bill provides or that might be lost because of another year's postponement.

The bill was unanimously reported from the committee. It has the approval of Secretary Mellon, who points out that it would not only make possible the use of existing governmental machinery without setting up new bureaus but might encourage private gifts to the Government in aid of the study of health problems. He has also stated in a letter to the chairman of the Senate committee that he is advised by the Bureau of the Budget that the appropriation which it carries "is not in conflict with the financial program of the President." This comes very near implying a Coolidge indorsement of the measure.

Assured is the indorsement of the leading scientific societies, of the American Medical Association, the American Public Health Association, and the American Farm Bureau Federation, and of many other organizations interested in public health, as well as of many prominent men in the field of medicine and education, including Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Doctor Mayo, Dr. Treat Johnson, of the Yale Medical School, and Dr. Reid Hunt, of the Harvard Medical School.

Private research and practice and State and municipal public-health service have done much to reduce the mortality rate and raise the average of life, but health is a matter of such supreme concern that the Nation itself should have a greater part than it has had in the study especially of those diseases which sweep the country without regard to State boundaries and can be conquered only by unified effort. It is to be hoped that with such backing as the bill has—official, scientific, and professional—it will not be halted by one voice.

WILLIAM H. CHAMBLISS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an affidavit by William H. Chambliss in support of legislation pending in the Senate, being Senate bill 2274, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

To whom this may concern:

From: William H. Chambliss, of Montclair, N. J.

Via: The United States Senate and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Subject: Bill S. 2274, Report No. 872, Senate Calendar No. 899, and some facts in connection therewith.

1. I hereby certify that the attached booklet, entitled "Calendar No. 899, Senate, Seventieth Congress, first session, Report No. 872," issued and published by the United States Senate in session in the Capitol at Washington, D. C., April 20, 1928, shows briefly in plain words one domestic enemy or foreign crooked man in our own American Consular Service and what he did to me, a native American Navy reserve officer of the confirmed rank of lieutenant in command of an unarmed ship at Rio de Janeiro, en route to Buenos Aires, in 1919, and that the crooked man has not yet been brought to trial for his acts, and that I have not been paid for my services as master of the ship, but, on the contrary, I have been kept out of a job for punishment because of my protests against the acts of the crook.

2. I was under our naval oath at the time and was under what is called retainer pay as a reserve, detached from World War active duty. Under my oath I was required to defend my ship, in accordance with our Constitution, against all enemies, foreign and domestic. Here I must state that the neglect of the so-called United States Shipping Board in not even equipping my ship or me, the commanding officer, with side arms for defensive purposes in piratical zones left me and the brand-new ship and all that she carried totally at the tender mercy of the crook, who employed a foreign boatload of armed aliens, who seized my ship, overpowered me, terrorized my men, and took from my ship her valuable cargo, and kidnaped me and marched me from under the American flag at the muzzles of their foreign rifles and took me ashore miles away and cast me into a vile foreign prison with a foreign flag of green color waving over it. At that time I was in the uniform of the United States of America and had my credentials in my pocket, but had no weapons of any kind to defend myself with, and the crook knew it.

3. That is how our foreign consul, trusted with our interests, handled me when I refused to sign my name to a fraudulent survey report on damaged propeller blades on my ship, and a set of fraudulent repair bills and a permit for him and his foreign aids to unload and sell my ship's cargo.

4. And this crooked man, Arminius T. Haeberle, whose name so clearly indicates its alien nativity, had "friends" who were powerful enough (diplomatically or politically) in the Department of State to whitewash him. Here I will state that Haeberle's protectors and "whitewashers"—perhaps Mr. Karr, or Carr, or Mr. Beck, or Mr. Flanoy or Flanory, of the Secretary of State's offices, know exactly whom I mean when I say Haeberle's "friends"—have sent letters to Members of the Senate and to officials of the Navy Department and Department of Commerce, denouncing me for the opposition that I really offered to Haeberle's crooked acts. Haeberle's sponsors—surely Mr. Beck or Mr. Flanory or Mr. Carr know who they are—have used State Department stationery and "franked" envelopes for approximately eight years in sending out letters telling Americans what a terrible man I am, and what a much-abused saint Haeberle is, and how bad it was of me to object to the thefts of a few hundred thousands of dollars worth of Government freight and cash from my ship at a time when poor Mr. Haeberle, the crooked consul, and perhaps some of his good "friends" needed some ready money. It is unbelievable that Mr. Beck and Mr. Carr and Mr. Flanory all three are innocently "ignorant" of the identity of the good friends of Mr. Haeberle who have signed such big names as "Frank L. Polk" and "Bainbridge Colby" and "Charles E. Hughes" and even our international peacemaker "Frank Kellogg's" names, or perhaps their rubber stamps to letters to Americans "roasting" me and telling how undiplomatic I was to oppose Haeberle's acts to the extent of calling them crooked. Here let me say that it matters not that Haeberle wore the title of "consul in charge" or that Beck, Flanory, and Carr may not enjoy the acquaintance of Haeberle's letter-writing friends who "sign" big names like "Polk," "Colby," "Hughes," and "Kellogg," to Senators asking them to kill my wage bill. I say that crooked deeds have been done by Haeberle and crooked whitewash brushes have been used and crooked fingers have signed names that look like the signatures of at least four stragiht, or consecutively straight, men who have been Secretary of State in turn, to letters denouncing me in terms unworthy of any diplomat who has held the "portfolio" since Wilson "fired" Robert Lansing. The language and attitude assumed by this Haeberle's friends in letters to Senators KING, FLETCHER, and others, telling how I made "false statements about the consular officers at Rio," does not exactly sound like the usually decent correspondence of the big men whose names are "signed" to those roastings; but they do sound rather more like that of some underworld "habitchuee" at some notorious New York murder trial where those who tell the truth in court are killed on their way home.

5. Now, gentlemen of the Senate, owing to the fact that one Member of your body still opposes the free passage of bill S. 2274, and offers no further reason or excuse for his opposition than the bare fact that he has "received letters from the Secretary of State," I hereby request that some Member of the Senate stand up and offer a resolution calling for the immediate consideration of bill S. 2274 and a "yes" or "no" vote on it. All Members who have been elected by majority votings at home owe it to themselves as well as to the sponsor and his opponent to insist upon a roll call and a vote on this bill, because it is a wage bill for money owed by the old 1919 Shipping Board to me, a reserve officer, under a signed contract, but withheld from me for punishment because I opposed a crook in a consulate.

WILLIAM H. CHAMBLISS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 14th day of January, 1929, at Montclair, N. J.

Notary Public of New Jersey.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 16714, being the naval appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, some time ago I introduced a bill——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me in order that I may make a request?

Mr. BLEASE. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The conference report on the bill (H. R. 15712) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, was presented to the Senate on last Tuesday afternoon. I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up and consented to now. I do not think it will lead to a word of debate, because Senators have had an opportunity to look into it. The conference report is now on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania about the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, we found that the present law provides exactly the same as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts for every branch of the Army except the Air Corps. The Air Corps asked us not to put in the amendment applying to them because of the need of special technical work, stating that safety was of so much more importance to them than the saving of a dollar or two on the repair of airplanes that they thought it would be highly unwise to do it. The committee felt that it was a matter of general legislation, and in view of the fact that the provisions of the amendment now apply to all the other departments of the Army and that the Air Corps was very strongly opposed to it, we thought it ought not to go in until some legislative bill had passed to that effect; not that we are out of sympathy with it, but we did not want to take the responsibility in an appropriation bill of making an amendment that would increase the jeopardy to the lives of the men of the Air Corps. If the Military Affairs Committees of the Senate and the House think it well to do so, all well and good, but we thought it was too heavy a responsibility for us to take now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in connection with Senate amendment No. 46, from which the Senate receded, I should like, if agreeable to the Senator from Pennsylvania, to have permission of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of War and a letter from the president of District No. 44, International Association of Machinists.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall be glad to have that done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 12, 1929.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR REED: The following amendment was added by the Senate to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 15712, p. 66):

"And provided further, That no part of the moneys herein authorized to be appropriated shall be used or expended under contracts hereafter made for the repair, purchase, or acquirement, by or from any private contractor, of any ordnance, machinery, article, or articles that at the time of the proposed repair, purchase, or acquirement can be repaired, manufactured, or produced in each or any of the Government arsenals or navy yards of the United States, when time and facilities permit, and when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, such repair, purchase, acquirement, or production would not involve an appreciable increase in cost to the Government."

Section 5 (a) of the national defense act, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, contains the following provision:

"The Assistant Secretary of War shall cause to be manufactured or produced at the Government arsenals or Government-owned factories of the United States all such supplies or articles needed by the War Department as said arsenals or Government-owned factories are capable of manufacturing or producing upon an economical basis."

The provision as contained in the national defense act is preferable to the amendment added by the Senate, for the reason that work under the former must be done at a Government arsenal or Government-owned factory only when the arsenal or Government-owned factory is able to do this work upon an economical basis. The Senate amendment places Government-owned factories on a preferred basis in competition with commercial companies.

It is believed that this amendment was added for the purpose of restricting procurements by the Air Corps only, and it will require the Air Corps to place orders with Government arsenals and navy yards for work normally done by the aeronautical industry. The amendment has the effect of taking away from the Secretary of War the discretion now vested in him by section 10 (t) of the Air Corps act of July 2, 1926. It is the policy of the War Department to encourage the aeronautical industry so that all material and supplies needed in time of emergency, particularly those items of military aircraft equipment which are not in commercial use, can be obtained from commercial firms rather than from Government arsenals and navy yards, which at that time will be fully engaged on work for which the factories are designed. It is to be pointed out, too, that many parts of aircraft, accessories, and items of equipment, such as instruments, propellers, etc., require a specialized manufacturing knowledge not in the possession of arsenals and navy yards. This amendment may cause orders to be placed with Government-owned factories lacking the necessary technical manufacturing experience which may result in reducing the structural strength and effectiveness of aircraft and thereby endanger the operating personnel.

The War Department does not favor this amendment because its operations are already governed by section 5 (a) of the national defense act except as to the Air Corps, whose operations are governed by the act of July 2, 1926, and urgently recommends that it not be enacted into law.

DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

FEBRUARY 16, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Referring to the letter dated February 12, 1929, addressed to Senator REED of Pennsylvania by the Secretary of War, commenting upon Senate amendment No. 46 to the War Department appropriation bill, and upon which you desire my comment, permit me to make the following statements:

The language contained in the national defense act of June 4, 1920, quoted in the Secretary's letter, would be satisfactory to our organization if it had been enacted subsequent to the Air Corps act of July 2, 1926. However, the Air Corps act and the department's rules and practices based thereon, excepts from the language of the national defense act, above referred to, the procurement of material for the Army Air Corps. The language of amendment No. 46 constitutes a very mild form of pressure upon the War Department to utilize to a greater extent than is at present the practice, the vast amount of equipment contained in the arsenals in which our Government has invested hundreds of millions of dollars. Inasmuch as the enforcement of the provision depends upon the "judgment of the Secretary of the War" and contains the limitations of time, facilities, and costs, the department should find no embarrassment or impossible situation in meeting the intent of the language.

The arsenals are equipped for doing a great deal of this Air Corps work. For instance, in 1925 the Rock Island Arsenal submitted an estimate for the reconditioning of 500 Liberty motors. The arsenal's estimate was $573 per motor for the first 100, and $473 per motor for the remainder. The Allison Engineering Co., of Indianapolis, Ind., bid $595 per motor for the first 100, and $488 per motor for the remainder. This was a difference of $22 per motor for the first 100, and $15 per motor for the remaining 400, in favor of the arsenal. The contract was nevertheless awarded to the Allison Engineering Co., notwithstanding the fact that the Rock Island Arsenal had previously performed this work in a satisfactory manner, both as to cost and quality of workmanship.

Notwithstanding the fact that the ordnance arsenals exist primarily for the production of ordnance, their more extensive use for peace-time requirements of the War Department has the compensating advantage of keeping intact a sizable corps of skilled workmen who, by means of a rotation system, can all acquire experience on ordnance work, even though they may work most of the time on nonordnance material. Industrial managers freely admit that it takes longer to train a skilled working force than it does to put up the buildings and install the machinery. The mere physical properties embraced within the arsenals would be of little advantage if a skilled working force which understands the art of manufacturing war materials had received no continuous training.

We submit that a skilled working force under the control of our Government in time of peace is second in importance only to a nucleus of an army and highly trained military officers maintained during times of peace.

It is unwise, in our opinion, to repose in any private industry all of the experience and facilities for carrying on a necessary part of our national defense. We feel that the War Department should have within its own control at least a certain proportion of the personnel and manufacturing facilities for the production of every instrument of national defense.

For economy reasons alone, our Government has seen fit in the past to provide itself with manufacturing plants for the production of war vessels, armor and armament, in order to prevent the formation of combinations among private concerns for enhancing the price of war materials to be purchased.

I sincerely trust that Senate amendment No. 46 will be retained in the bill.

Sincerely yours,

N. P. ALIFAS,
President District No. 44,
International Association of Machinists.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 303 and Senate Resolution 308. One of the resolutions provides for a continuation of the investigation being conducted by the Committee on Indian Affairs and the other provides for further appropriation of funds in the amount of $15,000. I think the consideration of the resolutions will lead to no discussion. If it shall, I will withdraw my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 303) submitted by Mr. FRAZIER on January 23, 1929, and reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$60,000" and insert "$45,000," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditure to be made under authority of Senate Resolution No. 79, Seventieth Congress, agreed to February 1, 1928, providing for a general survey of the condition of Indians in the United States, is hereby increased from $30,000 to $45,000.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota explain what is proposed to be done by the resolutions?

Mr. CARAWAY. The resolutions provide for a continuation of the investigation being conducted by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, was unanimous consent given for the consideration of the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not as yet. The resolution has just been read, and the Senator from Tennessee has asked that it be explained.

Mr. HAYDEN. I desire to investigate as to the expenditures heretofore made, and I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

The Senator from North Dakota also asks unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate Resolution 308, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 308) submitted by Mr. FRAZIER January 26, 1929, and reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let that resolution also go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, some time ago there was introduced in the House of Representatives, at the request of the two Federal judges in my State and of the State bar association, a bill creating a third judge for the State of South Carolina. The reasons for the creation of that judgeship were so plain that the House Committee on the Judiciary unanimously reported the bill favorably and the House unanimously passed it. Not the slightest objection was raised.

I have three letters which I desire to read, one of them from one of the United States district attorneys in South Carolina, who is not on my side of politics, and one from each of the United States judges in my State.

I have not heard the slightest reason why an adverse report should have been made on this bill by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. At the same time this bill was adversely reported there were other bills favorably reported, and which are now on the calendar, providing for the creation of several judgeships in other sections of the country. I do not see a single reason given for the creation of one of those judgeships that is any stronger than the reason given by the judges and district attorney in my State for the creation of a judgeship in South Carolina. I can not see any reason why this bill is held up with an adverse report.

I do not think I am violating any confidence when I say that the Chief Justice of the United States did me the honor the other day to call at my office and had a talk with me in regard to the judgeship matter. I shall not say any more in reference to his conversation than simply to state that he said more judges were needed. As to the reasons which he gave for his opinion, that is his own personal matter which he can make public or not as he may see fit.

My secretary has just handed me a letter from the other district attorney in my State, Mr. J. D. E. Meyer. I have not read the letter, but I will now read it to the Senate.

It is dated Charleston, S. C., February 19, and reads as follows:

I read with interest your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in reference to the necessity for an additional judge in South Carolina. I desire to congratulate you upon the stand which you have taken in this matter, and I desire to urge that you do everything possible to secure an additional judge for the State of South Carolina.

Owing to the fact that I am familiar with conditions existing in the eastern district of South Carolina, owing to my position as United States attorney, I desire to advise you of existing conditions. At the present time Judge Ernest F. Cochran is very greatly overworked. I might also add that litigation has so increased since I have been in the office that at the present time we frequently have to wait several months in order to hear a motion in a pending case before the judge, owing to the fact that the presiding judge simply has not the time to promptly hear all the matters which are brought to his attention. Both the number of cases and the importance of the cases have increased within the last few years. Again, several of the important cases involving very intricate questions have consumed considerable time for trial. Judge Cochran has been working consistently in an effort to dispose of the many matters brought before him, and while he never complains I feel certain that the burden placed upon him is unreasonable.

I am not in favor of creating an additional judicial district in the State of South Carolina, because I am of the opinion that to create an entirely new district would be to create additional expense, which is not warranted; and I further believe that the obtaining of jurors from the greater number of counties is more conducive to the administration of justice than it would be to obtain the jurors from a lesser number of counties. I am of the opinion that obtaining an additional judge for the State of South Carolina would be sufficient to satisfy the present needs of the State, and for that reason I am in favor of the same.

If there is any particular information which you desire, I trust that you will call upon me, and I shall be pleased to furnish the same.

Appreciating your efforts to relieve the present existing conditions in South Carolina, I am,

Respectfully,

J. D. E. MEYER,
United States Attorney.

I will also state, Mr. President, in order to show that it is not a party fight, that Mr. Meyer is not of my political faith.

In the RECORD of February 15 will be found a letter from the other district attorney, Mr. Joseph A. Tolbert, who is, by the way, not the Joe Tolbert who handles the South Carolina patronage, but is his nephew.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
WESTERN DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Greenville, S. C., February 2, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: I have just received the marked copy of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Wednesday, January 30, 1929, and have read with considerable interest the effort now being made by you to secure the passage of a bill providing for the appointment of an additional Federal judge for South Carolina.

I certainly hope that your efforts will be successful in regard to having an additional Federal judge appointed for this State. If you can succeed in having your bill passed providing for the appointment of an additional Federal judge in this State, you will not only provide a means to improve the congested conditions of the dockets in the two United States district courts now but you will accomplish a permanent and lasting benefit for the State of South Carolina.

With kindest regards and best wishes.

As ever,

J. A. TOLBERT.

Mr. Tolbert is the other district attorney of South Carolina. This letter is from Judge Watkins:

JUDGE'S CHAMBERS, UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
Anderson, S. C., February 13, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter of February 8, regarding the bill for an additional judge for South Carolina, I beg to advise you that in this district the urgency for such provision has constantly increased since my former letters to you and Congressman DOMINICK. Urgent matters are being delayed in spite of every effort to dispose of them, and the growth of business, particularly of corporate enterprises in this section of the country, indicates a large and constant increase of civil business. The added activities of prohibition agents promises a considerable increase in the criminal business. As heretofore stated, I am unable to understand how the merits of the case are affected or can be determined by a comparison with other districts. The logic of such argument would necessarily be that scandalous delays and injustices to litigants in one section of the country would furnish a reason for permitting such a condition in another section. Such course would not only weaken the prestige of the courts and the confidence of the public but would also display a disregard of the obligation of the Government to furnish to every citizen that prompt redress of grievances and assertions of legal rights which unquestionably the Government owes to its citizens. I think you are already aware of the fact that the conditions in Judge Cochran's district are more acute even than in my own, and that both of us have gone to the limit of our capacity and are still doing so to meet the situation.

Yours very truly,

H. H. WATKINS,
United States District Judge.

Judge Cochran writes from Aiken, S. C., February 11, 1929:

Hon. COLEMAN L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I received your letter of the 8th instant, inquiring whether my views were the same in reference to the necessity for an additional judge for South Carolina as they were when I wrote the letters which were cited in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

When called upon by the Department of Justice and by Congressman DOMINICK for the House Judiciary Committee on several occasions for my views upon this matter, I wrote them fully and sent certain data which I thought amply sustained my views. I also have in my annual reports for the judges' conference called attention to the same matter. Having on more than one occasion thus called the matter to the attention of the proper authorities, I have felt that my duty to the people of this district and persons having business in my court had been performed in that respect, and that any further suggestion on my part of the necessity for another judge would appear as if I were complaining of the burden which has been upon me for the last five years. For that reason, when the matter came up in the Senate, I did not feel like writing you or Senator SMITH, your colleague from this State, and thus appear to be obtruding my views.

Mr. President, Judge Watkins came here to Washington, and had quite a long conference back here in the President's room with the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The chairman is at liberty, of course, to make any statement he pleases about the matter; but Judge Watkins left after having seen the bill go through the House. He was not lobbying for it. He happened to be here on other business and I requested him to see and talk with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, about the matter. The Senator from Nebraska, of course, is at liberty, without my so stating, to make any statement he pleases in reference to Judge Watkins's conversation with him.

Still reading:

However, since you have made the inquiry, I have no hesitation in saying that my views have not changed and that I am more than ever convinced that there is a real necessity that I receive some assistance if those having business in this court are to receive the consideration that they are entitled to under the law. The last report of the Attorney General will give you the figures of the number of cases, etc., for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928; but, as I have had occasion more than once to say, mere figures are misleading. The question is the nature of the work and the time required for study and consideration. At the end of the last fiscal year I had the clerk prepare a synopsis of the contested matters which required hearing, study, and consideration, and I inclose you a copy of it. I think you will agree with me that this shows that there is more work than one man ought to be required to do; and this does not take into consideration the large amount of administrative and routine business which requires, of course, a great deal of time. As to the number of opinions filed by me during the year, a word of explanation should be made, in order that the figures may not be misunderstood. You will find that I filed 63 opinions altogether. Twenty-four of these opinions, while they required some consideration, were not of such a serious nature; but 39 of them were cases and matters involving serious study and consideration and required considerable time.

One difficulty in this district is the large number of contested matters, and especially the criminal jury trials. You will no doubt recall that last January I tried one criminal case which took a little over five weeks.

That case, Mr. President, could have been saved if the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate had reported a resolution that was offered here for the purpose of looking into the conditions of the farm loan land bank in Columbia, S. C.; but they saw fit not to do that, and now I will give you the situation.

This case took five weeks to try. They had a case down there growing out of the same transaction. Judge Cochran disqualified himself of his own motion in a way. A motion was made to get another judge, and Judge Cochran did not think the grounds were sufficient; but, rather than be embarrassed, he himself asked to have another judge sent to the State to try the case. They sent Judge Hayes, of North Carolina. Judge Hayes went down there, I think, in December; heard some preliminary motions of different kinds, postponed the case for a while, and went back to North Carolina. That case is still pending. The judge has been sick; the witnesses have been sick, or some other excuse has been offered, and that case is still open. Judge Hayes has not yet been able to dispose of it, and no man can tell to-day when he will be able to dispose of it, for the very reason I have just stated.

Reading on in Judge Cochran's letter:

There are other cases growing out of those same transactions which will take a number of weeks for trial. Of course, we hope that such long cases are not likely to occur again in the near future; but the fact remains that the nature of both the criminal and civil business is now such that it requires more time for the disposition thereof than formerly.

There was a slight decrease in the civil business last year, and a slight increase in the criminal business; but since the last fiscal year there has been a tremendous increase in the criminal business, and the volume of civil business continues to be steady. The figures since the last fiscal year are not yet available.

Owing to economic conditions and other factors, the situation in this district is somewhat peculiar. I have very definite views as to the causes of this peculiar situation; but it would unduly expand this letter for me to undertake to set forth these matters in detail. My view is that the situation can not continue indefinitely without serious prejudice to the public interests, and that some steps should be taken in the near future to relieve the present embarrassing condition.

Respectfully,

ERNEST F. COCHRAN,
United States District Judge.

Along with that he sends this:

Mr. President, there is your condition. Judge Hale, a very able judge, who pleased the people down there very much indeed with his rulings and fairness in administering justice in the courts, and Judge Hayes of North Carolina—those two judges within the last few months have had to be called into the State of South Carolina to relieve this condition. It is not a condition that I set out, because I do not know anything about it personally. It is not a condition that our delegation in Congress set out, because they know very little of it personally; but it is a condition set out by the two United States district attorneys of the State of South Carolina and by the two Federal judges of the State of South Carolina.

I want to ask the Senate, in all fairness, who knows the most about conditions in that State—the two judges who sit there on the bench every day, and the two district attorneys who sit there and transact the business every day, or men who never have been inside the State of South Carolina, and who do not even know how court is conducted down there, and who have never seen any history of the dockets except what they get from the records up here?

Why should New York have five more judges? Why should South Dakota have another judge? Why should Pennsylvania have another judge? Why should the ninth judicial circuit have another judge? Why should the tenth judicial circuit be divided into two parts? Florida got a new judge here the other day. Some other States have gotten new judges. We have been asked to create 11 judgeships recently, and the State of South Carolina is the only State in the American Union for which the Judiciary Committee has refused to recommend an additional judge, and that in the face of a request from two Republican district attorneys and a Republican United States judge.

It is not a Democratic fight. I do not know who will be appointed judge. I do not know who will be applicants for the office. I know one man who will not be an applicant for it and will not be appointed, and that is the man who is making the fight now on this floor for that judgeship. But the judgeship has been requested. It is not to create a job for somebody. As I say, I do not even know who will be the candidates for it; and if I have anything to say about who shall be appointed I shall, so far as my influence goes, help the man to get it who I believe is the most competent and the most qualified man for it. That is my position in this matter.

I do not want to object to any other State having the judges it needs; I do not like to be put in that position at all, especially when the great man who sits at the head of the judiciary in this country states that more judges are needed, a man whom I have admired since I first read of him, in whose home I have had the honor of being entertained, a man who I know is of the highest character and honor and the essence of truth itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the action of the House on the Interior Department appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives insisting on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 39 to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], when this matter was last before the Senate, moved that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 39. I offer as a substitute for that motion the following:

That the Senate recede from amendment numbered 39 to H. R. 15089, with an amendment as follows:

"In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate insert the following:

"'or, as to any privately owned lands as are not now occupied exclusively for residence, hotel, or religious purposes, by condemnation under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888 (U. S. C. p. 1302, sec. 257), whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, acquisition by condemnation proceedings is necessary or advantageous to the Government.'"

That will give the authority to condemn all lands within any of the parks except those occupied for the purposes specified.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARRIS rose.

Mr. BLEASE. It seems that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has a matter he wants to have taken up——

Mr. HARRIS. I will wait.

Mr. BLEASE. Just a moment. In order not to be in anybody's way, I shall finish my speech at a later hour in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is recognized.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. DILL. If the amendment of the Senator from Montana is accepted by the Senate, and it should be accepted by the House, would that mean that ground owned by private parties in the park would be subject to condemnation also?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; if the property is not a home, or is not used for religious or hotel purposes.

Mr. DILL. Suppose the parties owned mining property.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would be subject to condemnation.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that would be subject to condemnation.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have privately asked a question of the Senator from Montana, and he answered the question satisfactorily, and I think the Senate should have the benefit of the answer. In my mail I have had a great many letters from persons interested in conservation, interested particularly in the big trees. They have been very much disturbed lest the legislation should be in such form that those trees could be destroyed. May I ask the Senator in charge of the legislation whether we would have protection against that? Is the legislation in such form, if it is enacted, that those trees can be spared, if it is the wish of the Government to save them?

Mr. SMOOT. If this amendment is agreed to, the Government will have complete authority to condemn any timberlands in any part of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator from Montana take the same view?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do. Moreover, Mr. President, because the Senator has referred to the many letters exciting the public lest the big trees in California should suffer if this legislation should not be enacted, I desire to say that I put into the RECORD some 10 days ago a telegram from the owners of the timberlands in the Yosemite National Park, indicating that they have no purpose whatever to cut, at least not earlier than May, 1930.

Moreover, I then proposed, as I indicated yesterday, that it would not be objectionable to me if the provisions concerning condemnation, in view of the fact that there was no opposition offered by the Senators from California, be applied to the Yosemite. That was rejected. I then agreed that the condemnation proceedings should be applied to any lands in any of the parks valuable for the timber upon them, and that was rejected. Now, I propose that the condemnation provision be made applicable to any lands in any of the parks except those that are occupied as homes, or for religious or hotel purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the answer is very conclusive, and should be satisfactory to persons interested in this problem; but I would like to ask the Senator one more question. Is it intended that the Government shall proceed to make condemnation to protect the big trees?

Mr. SMOOT. Wherever necessary, that is what they are going to do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do I understand from the Senator from Montana that the amendment he now suggests has been agreed to?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean, has it been agreed to by the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator refers to the conferees?

Mr. McKELLAR. Has it been agreed to by the Senate conferees?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I wonder whether the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Utah——

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will state his inquiry.

Mr. FESS. My inquiry is in the interest of regular procedure—how we can recede with an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the opinion of the present occupant of the chair that the motion made by the Senator from Montana is not in order. Only one motion can be made which has a dual aspect—that is, a motion to recede and a motion to ask for a further conference. That is the ruling of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that ruling would equally apply, I take it, to the motion of the Senator from Utah, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Utah is in the usual form, as the Chair caught it. The Senator from Montana offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute which suggests legislation over which the Senate and the House have lost control by referring the disagreement between the Houses to a committee of conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent for leave to present the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope that leave will be granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent requested by the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DILL. Now I want to ask a question. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Would the Senator be willing to include in the motion mining properties owned in the parks?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My judgment is that it would be useless to do that. We might as well stand where we are.

Mr. DILL. These mining properties, it seems to me, are of very indefinite value, necessarily, and it would seem unnecessary that condemnation proceedings should be carried on. On the other hand, this seems to me a rather broad power to give the Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the same power the Government has in respect of the condemnation of other property.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I fully agree with the Senator from Washington, but we are confronted with this situation, and I am willing that this amendment should be made.

Mr. DILL. I have been supporting the Senator from Montana in this matter because I believe he is absolutely right in it, and I am not disposed to interpose any objection at this time, but I think it is a bad legislative practice to enact laws giving the Secretary of the Interior power to condemn all kinds of property, including mining claims legitimately held in the parks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right, and the power is more tyrannical when it is exercised, or authority is given to exercise it, with reference to homesteads and other property of that character acquired as homes of the people.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question to see if I heard him correctly?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator stated that under this legislation the Secretary of the Interior would have the right to condemn lands anywhere in the United States. Did he mean what he said?

Mr. SMOOT. I misunderstood the question. I simply meant to say that if the conference report were agreed to, the Secretary would have the same power to condemn lands within forest reserves——

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, the Senator confines it to forest reserves?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought that was what the Senator asked me.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not like this manner of proceeding. It is a bad precedent. The usual practice is to concur or not to concur. Nonconcurrence sends a report back to the conference committee, and if that were done in this case, the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] by his amendment would be considered by the conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the ruling of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was the ruling, and it is the practice to which we have always adhered. If we take this action we will set a precedent that will certainly come back to curse us. I hope the Senator will not insist on his amendment, but that the conference committee will take up the suggestion of the Senator from Montana and consider it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I drafted it in the first place in the form of an instruction to the conference committee. It was suggested to me, however, that that might be out of order. Perhaps the present occupant of the chair would take the view established by some precedents that instructions can be given to a conference committee. May I ask the present occupant of the chair what is his view about that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. However that may be, inasmuch as we are working under a unanimous-consent agreement, the question now is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to submit, before the matter is closed, a joint resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana protesting against the legislation as it now stands in the House text, and approving of the amendment adopted by the Senate, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Montana, ss:

I, W. E. Harmon, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the following is a true and correct copy of an act entitled Senate Joint Resolution 1, by Pauline, enacted by the twenty-first session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, and approved by J. E. Erickson, governor of said State, on the 12th day of February, 1929.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said State.

Done at the city of Helena, the capital of said State, this 14th day of February, A. D. 1929.

[SEAL.] W. E. HARMON,
Secretary of State.

Senate Joint Resolution 1

Whereas exclusive jurisdiction was ceded to the United States over and within all territory included in, or thereafter to be included in, that tract of land in the State of Montana, set aside by an act of Congress approved May 11, 1910, for the purposes of a national park, to be known as Glacier National Park; and

Whereas exclusive jurisdiction over said territory was ceded to the United States, reserving to the State of Montana the right to tax persons and corporations, their franchises and property included in said tract; and

Whereas the said Glacier National Park, at the time it was so ceded to the Government of the United States, included within its boundaries the homes of many of the citizens of the State of Montana, and their property, by means of which said citizens obtain their livelihood; and

Whereas it, the said Glacier National Park, contains property from which revenue is now being obtained by the State of Montana, and by several of its counties; and

Whereas the said Glacier National Park was established and jurisdiction thereof accepted by the Government of the United States, with full knowledge of such conditions, such property rights and such rights of the State of Montana, and its several counties, to obtain taxation revenue therefrom; and

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, that there has been introduced in the National Congress a bill for an act the purpose of which is to provide for the taking of such property, by eminent domain, by the appropriate arm of the Government of the United States; and

Whereas the loss by the citizens of the State of Montana of their homes above described, and the loss of the property by means of which such citizens obtain their livelihood, and the loss of such right of taxation, above set forth, to the State of Montana and its several counties, can not be compensated by payment of the value of such property; Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, That we do respectively protest against the enactment of such a law by the National Congress, in that its enactment would enable agents of the Government of the United States, to perpetrate a breach of faith on the part of such Government, with the State of Montana, and with individual citizens thereof; and direct that copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of State to the President of the United States, and to the Representatives and Senators of the State of Montana in Congress.

Approved by J. E. Erickson, governor, February 12, 1929.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, likewise I want to submit section 3 of the act to establish a National Park Service, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall make and publish such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper for the use and management of the parks, monuments, and reservations under the jurisdiction of the National Park Service, and any violations of any of the rules and regulations authorized by this act shall be punished as provided for in section 50 of the act entitled "An act to codify and amend the penal laws of the United States."

Thus by the cession of jurisdiction to the National Government over these parks the Secretary of the Interior is made the absolute autocrat of them. He is the lawgiver for these parks. He has the same power to make rules and regulations that the Congress of the United States has, as a State legislature would have, as a municipal council would have. He may make all necessary rules and regulations for the Government of the parks, and he has proceeded to do so, and among others he has made the following rule:

No person, firm, or corporation shall reside permanently, engage in any business, or erect buildings in the park without permission in writing from the Director of the National Park Service, Washington, D. C.

I refer to this for the reason that some support for the legislation is asked upon the claim that there are buildings in the park that are offensive, and that ought not to be there. The Secretary of the Interior already has full power to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for the construction of buildings in the park and to prescribe the use to which they shall be put, or to limit the use.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered as a substitute by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, may the substitute be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the proposed substitute.

The amendment was read, as follows:

or as to any such privately owned lands as are not now occupied exclusively for residence, hotel, or religious purposes, by condemnation under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888 (U. S. C. 1302, sec. 257), whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, acquisition by condemnation proceedings is necessary or advantageous to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I would like to have noted in my remarks in this connection the fact that I have received telegrams from the Boone and Crockett Club, the New York Zoological Society, Mr. Charles Frederick Carter, and others, expressing anxiety regarding the preservation of the big trees.

SIMON A. RICHARDSON

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9168) for the relief of Simon A. Richardson, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1850) thereon.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 9168, which has just been favorably reported by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. There will be no debate upon it, I am sure.

Mr. HALE. If there will be no debate, I shall not object.

Mr. SIMMONS. There will be no debate whatever. It is a very small bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9168) for the relief of Simon A. Richardson, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Simon A. Richardson, who enlisted in the Navy July 26, 1898, shall hereafter be held and considered to have enlisted on the 26th day of May, 1898: Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, or allowances shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of amendments, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. KING. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the clerk will read the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. If a Senator has the floor and yields for the submission of a conference report, does he thereby lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Following general debate he does. The Senator from South Carolina yielded the floor and general debate ensued. The Senator thereby lost all right to the floor until again recognized by the Chair. The clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Naval Reserve," on page 10, line 23, after the word "duties," to strike out "$4,697,931" and insert "$4,750,000"; in line 24, after the word "than," to strike out "$160,000" and insert "$180,000"; and on page 11, line 4, after the word "than," to strike out "$859,875" and insert "$882,931," so as to make the paragraph read:

For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve and Naval Militia; pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when employed on authorized training duty; mileage for officers while traveling under orders to and from training duty; transportation of enlisted men to and from training duty, and subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; subsistence of enlisted men during the actual period of training duty; subsistence of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve while performing authorized training or other duty without pay; pay, mileage, and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve, and pay, allowances, and subsistence of enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when ordered to active duty in connection with the instruction, training, and drilling of the Naval Reserve; pay of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve for the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and administrative duties, $4,750,000, of which amount not more than $180,000 shall be available for maintenance and rental of armories, including pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage, not more than $78,011 shall be available for clerical and messenger services for Naval Reserve administration in naval stations and districts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, not more than $882,931 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for aviation material, equipment, fuel, and rental of hangars, and not more than $754,816 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for fuel and the transportation thereof, and for all other expenses in connection with the maintenance, operation, repair, and upkeep of vessels assigned for training the Naval Reserve.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine give us some explanation of the amendment on page 10, line 23?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, does not the reading of the bill have to be completed first?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that committee amendments are in order whenever they are reached.

Mr. HARRISON. I just noticed the proposed increase in the appropriation, and I thought perhaps the Senator from Maine might want to make some explanation.

Mr. HALE. The Senator wants some explanation of the amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HALE. The amendment to which the Senator refers appears on page 10, line 23, of the bill. It adds $52,069 to the House figures. Of this amount, $20,000 is for a merchant-marine reserve and $32,069 to provide for the training of aviators in the Naval Reserve who are 35 years old and over. The provision for the merchant-marine reserve is to provide a course of instruction for members of the reserve which, under the Naval Reserve law was organized and started, but no provision has been made for paying them. There is no such provision in this bill. All the amendment does is to provide a course of instruction for them. That is taken care of by the $20,000 increase in the appropriation.

The second item is to take care of the training of aviators in the Naval Reserve who are 35 years of age and over. The committee heard from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the Air, Mr. Warner, and from the Secretary of the Navy on this matter, and they both emphasized the importance of not cutting off these aviators at the age of 35. I may say that in the British Navy a man is not allowed to retire from flying until he reaches the age of 48 unless for some physical defect. Many of our best flying officers in the Navy are over the age of 35. There are 26 of these officers in the reserve, and it was considered by the committee advisable to give them the practice in flying.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 22, page 16, the last clause read being as follows:

BUREAU OF ENGINEERING

ENGINEERING

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxiliary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus; repairs, preservation, and renewals of electric interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate machinery belonging to other bureaus; searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast signal service; equipage, supplies, and materials under the cognizance of the bureau required for the maintenance and operation of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats; care, custody, and operation of the naval petroleum reserves; purchase, installation, repair, and preservation of machinery, tools, and appliances in navy yards and stations, pay of classified field force under the bureau; incidental expenses for naval vessels, navy yards, and stations, inspectors' offices, the engineering experiment station, such as photographing, technical books and periodicals, stationery, and instruments; services, instruments and apparatus, supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work; payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed; in all, $19,686,300, and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy, to make transfers during the fiscal years 1929 and 1930 from the naval supply account fund to the appropriations "Engineering, Bureau of Engineering, fiscal years 1929 and 1930," and "Construction and Repair, Bureau of Construction and Repair, fiscal years 1929 and 1930," of sums not to exceed in the aggregate $1,500,000, to be available exclusively for the procurement and installation of new tools and machinery for shops under the cognizance of the Bureau of Engineering and Construction and Repair: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and offices of United States inspectors of machinery and naval material for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, shall not exceed $1,715,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs whether, under the heading of Bureau of Engineering and out of the sum of $19,686,300, any part of the expenditures incident to modernizing the Oklahoma and any other naval vessel is included, or is the appropriation for the Bureau of Engineering wholly independent of the amount required for that purpose?

Mr. HALE. This appropriation is for the general work of the Bureau of Engineering of the Navy. The item of new construction comes under a different heading in the appropriation bill as does also the appropriation for major alterations of naval vessels.

Mr. KING. Then this $19,000,000-plus appropriation for the Bureau of Engineering does not include the amount necessary for the repair or the modernizing of some of the existing battleships?

Mr. HALE. No; it is simply for the general engineering work of the Navy for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Maine know the amount carried by other appropriation bills for the Navy for the next fiscal year? What I mean is this: This appropriation bill carries three hundred and forty-odd million dollars, and in addition we have passed other appropriation bills for the Navy. The question I am asking is, Can the Senator advise us as to the entire cost of the Navy for the next fiscal year?

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Utah refer to the deficiency bills? We shall have a further deficiency bill this year which will include certain items that we know about at the present time. For instance, the other day the Senate passed a bill providing for the modernization of the Arizona and the Pennsylvania. That bill has not yet been signed by the President. In regulating the personnel of the Navy for the coming year it is really necessary that the bill should become a law, so that the men who are on those ships may be released and may take their places on the Oklahoma and Nevada, which are now undergoing repairs. The deficiency bill will, in all probability, if the President signs it, carry an appropriation taking care of that matter. Then, we know that there will be certain deficiencies to take care of the marines in Nicaragua and in China.

Mr. KING. And also in Haiti?

Mr. HALE. No; I do not think there will be any deficiency for taking care of the marines in Haiti.

Mr. KING. Does this bill carry an appropriation for the maintenance of marines in Haiti?

Mr. HALE. The bill carries appropriations for the maintenance of the marines everywhere except the additional cost for the special missions in Nicaragua and in China. It does include the appropriation for the marines in Haiti.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will pardon me if I refer again to the question which I propounded in good faith and because of a desire to learn just what the appropriations will be for the next fiscal year for the Navy. This bill as passed by the House carries an appropriation of $347,750,448. The Senate has added to the bill $12,962,069.

Mr. HALE. That is correct.

Mr. KING. So that the amount of the bill as reported to the Senate is $360,716,517?

Mr. HALE. That is correct.

Mr. KING. As I recall, we passed for the Navy two bills within the past month which carried, as I remember, considerably over $20,000,000.

Mr. HALE. Those were bills merely authorizing expenditures.

Mr. KING. They were authorizations.

Mr. HALE. I will explain to the Senator that the money to take care of those authorizations will be provided in the deficiency bill. A small amount does appear in this bill for the Nevada and the Oklahoma. As the Senator will remember, we increased the limit of cost of the modernization of those vessels by, I think, $450,000. That item does appear in this bill, but, so far as the additions which may come during the fiscal year 1930 are concerned, I can not tell the Senator at the present time what they will be, because they will come on the deficiency bill, and, of course, no one can estimate what they will be. The deficiencies last year, as I recall, amounted to approximately $30,000,000, and this year they are very much less than that.

Mr. KING. The Senator is always very frank and does not conceal any rather unpleasant conditions as affecting some of these bills—unpleasant because of the enormous appropriations involved. Does not the Senator think that the $360,000,000 which is carried in this bill will be augmented by at least from twenty-five to forty million dollars in deficiency bills before the expenses of the Navy for 1930 shall have been met?

Mr. HALE. I can not tell anything about that any more than the Senator can. I suppose there will be some deficiencies; but I know of no particular deficiencies that are expected at the present time.

Mr. KING. What does the Senator think will be the aggregate for the Navy that will be appropriated before we adjourn in the deficiency bills that will be reported?

Mr. HALE. As I have said, if we take care of the Arizona and Pennsylvania in full, that will amount to about $14,500,000; and the deficiency appropriation for the expenses of the marines in Nicaragua and China will be about $3,600,000. Then, I think, there is a matter of about $1,000,000 to take care of the submarine safety devices recommended by the commission appointed by the President. Those figures, however, I have not as yet received. I know of no other large figures that are coming in.

Mr. KING. Then the expenditures for the Navy——

Mr. HALE. Those expenditures, of course, would come on the appropriations for the current year rather than the appropriations for next year. They would have to be added to the 1929 bill.

Mr. KING. That is in the deficiency bill which is coming now?

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is the second deficiency bill.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator have in mind the appropriations which were made for the Navy for the fiscal year 1929?

Mr. HALE. The Senator will see on the report that the appropriations for 1929 were $362,345,812.

Mr. KING. Then the appropriations that will be carried in the deficiency bill will be properly chargeable to last year?

Mr. HALE. To last year.

Mr. KING. So that that would swell the appropriations for 1929 to more than $375,000,000?

Mr. HALE. Yes; if they are so added. Of course, I can not tell whether the President will sign the bill that is now before him authorizing the modernization of the Arizona and the Pennsylvania.

Mr. KING. The President having signed the cruiser bill, it is quite evident that he will sign the measure to which the Senator refers; and I regret to say, judging from the example just referred to, that other measures that are subject to criticism as militaristic seem to meet with legislative and Executive approval. An appropriation in peace times of $380,000,000—it will be more than that—for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year for the ordinary expenses of the Navy is something which ought to excite the curiosity, if not the interest, of the American people. We are loud in our declarations for peace. Many of our preachers, public writers, and Senators proclaim with fervor and vehemence that we are a peace-loving nation. To exemplify our love for peace we proceed to appropriate for the fiscal year 1929 nearly $800,000,000 for the ordinary expenses of the Army and Navy. When this fact is mentioned the reply is made, "This is the richest and most powerful nation in the world and $800,000,000 are unimportant." For the fiscal year 1930 it is certain that the military and naval appropriations will exceed this stupendous sum. Perhaps they will aggregate $850,000,000 for the Army and the Navy. And this when we are at peace with the world and we claim to be the apostle and evangel of peace and have just signed a treaty renouncing war and solemnly declaring that we will settle all disputes by pacific means. The United States should carry the message of international good will to all nations. It should be the crusader for the abolition of war and the reduction of armaments. The world needs a great moral leader. The hour is ripe for such leadership. This Nation, because of its influence and power, its freedom from domestic controversies, its immunity from assaults from without, its assured safety and progress—its invulnerable position—should set the example for peace—and be worthy to wear the crown of moral and spiritual leadership in all the world.

When we hear the claims so often made in our country of the devotion of the United States to peace, and then hear the strident cries for hundreds of millions for military purposes, we may expect that there will arise a feeling among some people as to our sincerity, and that our course will awaken skepticism as to the purposes of the United States and lead other nations to larger expenditures for "military preparedness."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has given a great deal of study to the naval bill as well as all other measures that carry appropriations in Congress. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying. As I caught the figures, the naval appropriations this year will amount to about $380,000,000.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean for the fiscal year 1929?

Mr. HARRISON. For the fiscal year 1929.

Mr. KING. At least that amount.

Mr. HARRISON. How much were they for the fiscal year 1928?

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to call attention to the figures for a number of years?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I can give the Senator the figures for 1928. The figures for 1928 were $318,131,957, and there was a deficiency that year of about $30,000,000.

Mr. KING. If the Senator wants to be accurate—and I know he does—the appropriations for the Navy for the fiscal year 1928 were $344,771,626.22, and that does not include subsequent appropriations authorized during that year.

Mr. HALE. I have given the figures that were given to me by the Navy Department.

Mr. HARRISON. How much were they for the preceding year, 1927?

Mr. KING. I do not desire any controversy with my friend from Maine. The Senator stated that he gave the figures, but that there were deficiencies following. That would account for the differences between the figures submitted by him and those stated by me.

Mr. HALE. The figures were very nearly the same.

Mr. KING. So that the figures which I have obtained from an examination of the records confirm the accuracy of what I said, that the appropriations for the Navy for the fiscal year 1928 were $344,771,626.22.

Mr. HARRISON. That was for 1928?

Mr. KING. 1928.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator the figures for 1927?

Mr. KING. Yes; $324,917,575, but there were deficiencies which increased this amount.

Mr. HARRISON. So, really, they have been going up since 1928.

Mr. HALE. In that case, Mr. President, my figures show a little larger amount—three hundred and twenty-two million and odd thousand dollars for the appropriation bill, and $2,087,654.99 for the deficiency bill.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator, on the basis of the estimate, what will be approximately the appropriations for 1930 and 1931 with this new program adopted?

Mr. HALE. It is impossible to tell what they will be for 1931, Mr. President. The report shows what the estimates are for this year—$361,465,132.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, they will be larger, will they? It is natural to assume that they will be larger in 1930 than in 1929, and larger in 1931 than in 1930, with this cruiser program.

Mr. HALE. I should say they would be larger; yes. We have done very little under increase of the Navy for replacement of ships during the last few years. Of course, that will come now in the next few years. There must be large expenditures for that purpose in the near future.

Mr. HARRISON. So that bears out the statement the Senator from Utah is making, that we are climbing up in our appropriations for the Navy?

Mr. HALE. Yes; but I think the Senator should realize that a large part of that increase is due to the fact that we have developed a new branch of the Navy—the air branch of the Navy—and that we are now spending on direct appropriations for that branch about $31,000,000, and for indirect appropriations, including the hire of the men, and so forth, very nearly $20,000,000 more; so that is really $50,000,000 that has been added to what we formerly spent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator knows that there is no diminution in the number of the personnel of the Navy, no reduction in the number of officers or enlisted men. The Senator also knows that there is no decrease in the number of naval bases, yards, and stations maintained by the Government. It is a notorious fact that we are maintaining many bases, navy yards, and stations that are wholly unnecessary. But political and other pressure preserves them, though their cost is millions of dollars annually. This is pure waste. As a matter of fact, the Senator will agree with me that the cruiser bill which was passed a few days ago will involve the outlay of millions and perhaps tens of millions of dollars for improvements upon yards and docks, naval bases and stations, and for the purchase of equipment in order to construct the new cruisers and to repair the various vessels belonging to the Navy.

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator about that. The outlay for fixing up the yards to take care of these ships is very small. These ships will be built in yards where we already have the ways, and the total cost of fixing up the ways is, I believe, somewhat under $2,000,000. We are spending now a certain amount provided by this bill for fixing up shops and other facilities in the yards.

Mr. KING. The Senator can not contend that with the construction of 15 new cruisers, a large number of which are to be built by the Government, additional expenditures will not be called for in order to prepare the necessary navy yards, ways, and shops, and acquire machinery for their construction.

Mr. HALE. One of the reasons why the Committee on Naval Affairs was in favor of having the ships built in the yards was that there were facilities there which were not being used, and now those facilities will be used in the construction of these ships.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, notwithstanding the observations of my friend—who desires to be and usually is exceedingly accurate—I have no doubt that we will be called upon if the 15 cruisers are constructed to build additional yards or greatly improve those now owned by the United States and to improve the machinery and the appliances needed in ship construction.

Mr. HALE. A certain amount will be needed for that purpose.

Mr. KING. So, Mr. President, the expenditures for the fiscal year 1930, concerning which the Senator from Mississippi inquired, are still in nubibus. We do not know what they will be. We know that this bill carries appropriations of the amount which I stated a moment ago—$360,712,517. We know that the deficiency bill which will be reported before adjournment will carry $20,000,000, or thereabouts. We also know that after such deficiency bill has been passed there will be other expenditures or contingent liabilities that will accrue which will be chargeable to this fiscal year, and there will be large deficiencies that will have to be met, incurred in the fiscal year 1930. It is impossible even to hazard a guess as to what the costs of the Navy will be for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930; and no one can predict, with this navalistic spirit which is flagellating the people, what the expenses of the Navy will be for the fiscal year 1931. The expenses are increasing and if the present policy is pursued, it is certain that within the next few years the requirements for the Army and the Navy will annually exceed $1,000,000,000.

Mr. President, we only know that we are embarking upon a tempestuous sea, whipped by propaganda from naval and military officers, including the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and others who are interesting themselves in securing enormous appropriations for so-called "preparedness."

A few months ago the Secretary of the Navy and representatives of the Naval Board appeared before the House Committee on Appropriations dealing with naval affairs, and urged authorizations and appropriations for 71 new naval craft, the cost of which would have been, directly and indirectly, approximately $1,000,000,000. The Secretary of the Navy was frank enough, during the course of his testimony, to admit that he envisioned a program which would cost within a few years more than $2,500,000,000 for naval construction. He did not include in this stupendous sum the usual and ordinary expenses of the Navy, which are mounting higher and higher each year, and which this year will be between $380,000,000 and $400,000,000.

I recall that the present chairman of the House committee during the hearings suggested that the 71 naval vessels which were demanded by the Secretary of the Navy and the Naval Board were merely a "starter" for naval construction. Seventy-one new naval vessels, costing approximately $1,000,000,000, were to be only a "starter" in naval construction!

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate in an address delivered last spring stated that we would soon be called upon to appropriate at least $60,000,000 annually for replacements, and that was, of course, in addition to the appropriations which were sought for the new cruisers and other naval craft.

We will soon be told that the battleships are obsolete. We hear the echoes now that they are obsolescent, and when they become obsolete hundreds of millions will be demanded for the construction of new battleships. The mounting costs of naval vessels should arouse the attention of the country. A few years ago a battleship cost a few million dollars. They now cost between forty and fifty million dollars, and plans were drawn for some which would cost $75,000,000 each.

What is to be the end of this naval spirit and these enormous demands for naval appropriations? What will be the amount demanded from the taxpayers of the United States to meet the demands of the bellofists who are flagellating the people and telling them that our security is menaced and the life of the Nation is in danger. The Presiding Officer looks a little incredulous when I use the word "bellofists." The word "pacifist" is on the lips of some. The Latin word for "peace" is embraced within the word "pacifist." There is a Latin word "bellum." Why not "bellofist"? There are bellofists in the world—shall we not say some in the United States—who are nervously and excitedly interested in securing not only four hundred million annually for the ordinary expenses of the Navy but stupendous additional sums for new naval construction.

Yet, as I said, this is a peaceful Nation, and we boast that we are the leaders in spiritual thought, that we wear the crown of moral and ethical primacy among the nations of the world. We evidence our devotion to peace by having carried on during the past two years the most extensive propaganda for naval and military expenses that has ever occurred in peace times in the United States. Officers of the Army and the Navy have visited all parts of the United States during this period and addressed organizations and gatherings of every character. They have advocated what they called "preparedness" and urged large appropriations both for the Army and the Navy. And other propagandists have added to the flame that has burned fiercely throughout this land.

Mr. President, there have been repercussions in the United States of a military character that must be disappointing to those who believe in international peace and good will, in international fellowship that binds nations together, in order that they may march side by side toward the illuminated heights of peace, where there will be found economic, industrial, and political freedom.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asked what the naval appropriations were for 1928. They are more than $344,000,000 for that year. For 1929 they will be as I stated, more than $380,000,000. For 1930 they will be more than $400,000,000. For 1931, with this progressive ratio maintained, they will be $450,000,000 or more. And if a program for battleships and other naval craft replacements is to be inaugurated, then the costs will be much greater.

In 1922 the naval appropriations amounted to more than $410,000,000, but a considerable part of this amount was to meet obligations incurred during the war. There were "hangover" obligations resulting from war contracts, some of which were rescinded or abrogated after the war. In 1923, after those contracts had been met and the obligations chargeable to the Navy, which were incurred during the war, had been discharged, the ordinary expenses of the Navy were $302,873,000. In 1924 they began to rise, and amounted to $330,000,000 plus for the ordinary expenses of the Navy. In 1925 there was a slight reduction, the appropriations amounting to $300,000,000. In 1926 the appropriations were $302,862,000. In 1927 they amounted to $324,917,000; and in 1928, as I have stated, they were more than $344,000,000.

The tide is rapidly rising, and the future has no promise of a diminution in the annual expenses of the Navy; but, on the contrary, there is a stern command that we shall increase our appropriations, a command, in my opinion, not by the great mass of the people, but by an active minority that exercises too great influence in legislative and executive activities.

During the discussions in the Senate the past month much has been said about minorities and the power which they exercise. I think no country lends itself so much to propaganda—and not infrequently propaganda of a sinister, unfair, inaccurate, and unethical character—as the United States. There are scores of organizations, many of them having headquarters in Washington, which are constantly engaged in propaganda in behalf of policies, measures, and legislation touching almost every activity of communities, States, and nations. These organizations are active and militant. Many of them have no concern as to the rights of the States or the limitations upon the Federal Government. Demands are made upon Congress for appropriations, for all sorts of legislation—often absurd and fantastic—and in my opinion Congress—and I say this without any disrespect—too often yields to selfish, irrational, and improper demands.

Much of our legislation is not the result of calm and deliberate consideration, or the dispassionate examination of the needs of the people, and what justice and the welfare of all require. Thousands of bills are introduced each session, and the appropriations sought would drain the Treasury of the United States and compel the levy of additional taxes.

Since coming into the Chamber this morning, I have been handed a statement of the expenses of our Government for a number of years past. It presents a rather unsatisfactory situation. The increase has been from a few hundred millions to more than four billions. The expenditures for the next fiscal year are approximately $5,000,000,000. The oft-expressed purpose of the party in power to return to "normalcy" in expenditures has not been realized, and we are now told by Republican leaders that the national expenses will constantly increase. Where attention is challenged to these enormous burdens, and particularly those resulting from the demands of the Departments of War and Navy, the reply usually made is that the United States is rich and can afford to grant these stupendous appropriations made by Congress. There seems to be a sentiment that large appropriations and enormous expenditures by governments are evidences of prosperity. The rule of economy is obsolete; and the attempt to compel agencies of the Government to follow a policy of rigid economy is resented and denounced. There is too much materialism; the disposition to measure everything by the standard of worldly wealth and material things manifests itself in many avenues of life of this country.

It were well if there were more regard for the moral and spiritual values of life; that the true basis and foundation of happiness and genuine progress were relied upon, that there was less militarism and more of fellowship and good will; that there was greater devotion to art and music and knowledge and spiritual things.

I refer again to the testimony of Secretary Wilbur. He asked for authorization to construct 71 war vessels, the cost of which would have been approximately $1,000,000,000, and he admitted that the program of the Navy called for over $2,000,000,000 for naval construction.

Mr. President, we can not, in my opinion, justify the demands being made upon the Government for military purposes. No military power that ever cursed the earth demanded of the people $800,000,000 in peace times for military expenditures. And yet this Republic, consecrated to peace and justice and freedom, now takes from the people nearly $1,000,000,000 for its Army and Navy, to be expended in one year. And the tragedy of the situation is that there is no promise of relief. Indeed, the program calls for heavier taxes and larger appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me to make a request?

Mr. KING. May I inquire what the request is?

Mr. HALE. That the Senate lay aside the unfinished business and take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. I think the Senate desires to proceed with the Nicaraguan canal bill. Does the Senator want to lay aside his own bill? Is he filibustering against the Navy bill?

Mr. HALE. My bill is not now before the Senate. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution has been laid before the Senate, and I wish to ask unanimous consent that that measure be laid aside so that we may proceed with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has been patient and I know he is greatly interested in securing consideration of the measure upon which he has set his heart. I should be sorry to disappoint him. I think we had better proceed with the consideration of the Nicaraguan canal measure.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator not let me make my motion?

Mr. KING. For the present I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to the sponsor of the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution?

Mr. KING. I yield for a question.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator has shown so much consideration for the measure that certainly he would yield to its sponsor.

Mr. KING. I do not want to yield the floor or yield for any purpose which would take me from the floor, certainly until I learn what is to be the program of my Republican friends.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator from New Jersey had in mind proposing another unanimous-consent agreement. In other words, mirroring the very kind suggestion of the Senator from Utah that I am very much interested as sponsor of the measure, I want to propose a unanimous-consent agreement which will insure its final consideration, which seems at the moment somewhat obscure.

Mr. KING. Procrastination is the thief of time. The Senator's measure has the right of way, and I suggest that the Senator take up his joint resolution.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. It seems to me, along that line, that if the Senator would consent to a unanimous-consent agreement which would not take the Senator from the floor we would get along better in that way. I hope the Senator will not object to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. KING. I am not yielding the floor except that I yield to my friend from New Jersey to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. EDGE. I shall not take advantage of the courtesy of the Senator from Utah further than to submit the request. I have no desire to delay consideration of the naval appropriation bill or any other appropriation bill, as I have already indicated. However, I do feel that the joint resolution providing for a survey of a very important national subject should at least be assured final consideration and I will make this suggestion for a unanimous-consent agreement. I think it demonstrates my generosity and I hope it will be complied with.

Upon the conclusion of the consideration or disposition of the naval appropriation bill, on which I am taking some chances. I ask unanimous consent that the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) be resumed as the unfinished business and be continued until its final disposition, with the understanding that there shall be four hours unlimited debate following the disposal of the naval appropriation bill, following which debate shall be limited to 10 minutes upon the joint resolution or amendments thereto.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. DILL. There are two parts to the request as I understand it. One is a request for unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business, which is the Nicaraguan canal bill.

Mr. EDGE. That is correct.

Mr. DILL. The other is that when the naval bill has been completed the Nicaraguan canal measure shall then resume its status as the unfinished business.

Mr. EDGE. With the understanding as presented that there shall be four hours of debate without limitation, and that beyond the four hours there shall be a limit on the debate.

Mr. DILL. That is the third part of it. Here are three unanimous-consent requests in one.

Mr. EDGE. It seems necessary under the conditions that we are now facing.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator mean that he thinks it is so important to build the Navy that we should not have the canal first? Is he not afraid he will get a Navy and not have the Nicaraguan canal for the Navy to go through?

Mr. EDGE. In answer to that, though the answer is obvious without my making it, I have no desire that the Nicaraguan canal measure shall be used as a vehicle upon which a filibuster on the naval appropriation bill or any other appropriation bill shall be waged. So I am making what I consider a businesslike proposal, that it shall succeed in consideration the naval appropriation bill. Of course, when I do that I am naturally running the risk of final disposition of the naval appropriation bill. It does seem to me that the unanimous-consent request should be granted by the Senate in view of the fact that the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution is now the unfinished business.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator will restrict his request to the mere matter of laying aside the unfinished business and taking it up again, I shall have no objection to that part of it; but I do object to fixing a time for debate before the debate has begun.

Mr. EDGE. Of course, I would not imagine it would be necessary to ask unanimous consent to take up the Nicaraguan canal measure upon the disposition of the naval appropriation bill. I have too much regard for the element of fairness that would control the Senate, and hence I am sure the Nicaraguan canal measure would naturally be restored as the unfinished business without any unanimous-consent agreement. The only object I had in submitting the request was to try to arrange for the final disposition of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. HALE. Am I to understand that objection has been made to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DILL. I objected to the latter part of the request.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Utah still have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah still has the floor.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, has the unanimous-consent request been granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been granted. It was objected to by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Washington objected to the latter part of it.

Mr. EDGE. There is nothing in the former part of it, because I do not propose to stand in the way of the naval appropriation bill. I have made that very clear. Upon its disposition I will at once move to take up the Nicaraguan canal measure, if it shou'd not be resumed as the unfinished business without a motion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, what was the latter part of the request that the Senator from Washington objected to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Limiting debate on the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I have just come into the Chamber. So as not to treat anybody with any degree of injustice or delay I ask unanimous consent that the naval appropriation bill be taken up, and after it is disposed of that the Nicaraguan Canal joint resolution shall be resumed as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. To which I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KING. I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin, though I ought in fairness to yield to the Senator from Maine, because he asked me first to do so.

Mr. HALE. I would like to make a motion. Will the Senator from Utah yield for that purpose?

Mr. KING. Will the Senator withhold it for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I was merely going to express the hope that the Senator from New Jersey would not further ask unanimous consent or permit unanimous consent for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill until the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution is disposed of. It seems to me that the passage of the joint resolution of which the Senator from New Jersey has charge in all probability might minimize the necessity for the extreme haste proposed by the Senator from Maine in building the cruisers. I am not going to discuss that question now. I am just endeavoring to persuade the Senator from New Jersey in the hope that the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution providing for the investigation might be kept before the Senate as the unfinished business until we can dispose of it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will further yield——

Mr. KING. I yield further to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I have already expressed my view as to that course of procedure. Much as I am interested in the passage of the joint resolution, which it is not necessary for me to emphasize further, I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, to have it used as a vehicle for filibuster, or whatever term may be used, to prevent the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill. I have no doubt in the world as to the fairness of the Senate in restoring the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution when this important appropriation bill is disposed of. I will not now even ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 1786, the naval appropriation bill, thus displacing the present unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield for that purpose?

Mr. KING. I think, in all fairness to the Senator from Maine and to the Senate, I should permit the Senate to express itself upon that matter, although I feel that it would be unfortunate if we should displace the Nicaraguan canal measure at this time, because that is so "highly important."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Maine is debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is debatable.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I think it is perfectly plain that if we are to proceed, we ought to do it in order, and each bill ought to have what belongs to it in the matter of time. There is no question that appropriation bills have a position of a senior order if they wish to take it. It seems to me that we could get along faster and better if we might agree to the unanimous-consent request to proceed with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill for a time at least, until we can ascertain what the real situation is.

Mr. KING. Let me say to my dear friend from Wyoming, whose devotion to public duty is known to all of us, that I think he is sometimes a little too earnest in crowding appropriation bills through the Senate without debate. I am making no criticism, for if I were in his place probably I should be as earnest as he is, although I can not command the earnestness which he does. But we will appropriate before we have adjourned nearly $5,000,000,000. Bills have been passed through the Senate carrying from $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 up to $1,000,000,000 without one hour of debate. No legislative body in the world has exhibited such confidence, I hope not misplaced, in those who have formulated the appropriation bills. We have taken them without a grain of salt and swallowed them without debate.

My friends must not be too anxious, when an appropriation bill carrying nearly $400,000,000 is placed before us this morning, if it shall be debated a little while. If the Senator from New Jersey intimates that a little debate, which has not consumed more than half an hour, is a filibuster, I think he had better revise his judgment and his concept of what a filibuster is. There has been no evidence whatever of any filibuster.

Appropriation bills have been accepted without challenge as they have come from the hands of their constructors. The naval appropriation bill will go through, of course. The Senate is committed to enormous appropriations. I am only surprised that the bill does not carry $450,000,000 instead of nearly $400,000,000, but it will go through, and if my friends will possess their souls and patience a little while they will see the opportunity to take out of the Treasury of the United States this golden stream that will leave a deficit, so that the Finance Committee will have the unpleasant task at the next session of the Congress of increasing the burden of taxes upon the American people.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico will state the inquiry.

Mr. BRATTON. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. DILL. I want to say something about it before the motion is voted on. I have no intention of delaying a vote unduly.

The Senator from New Jersey has pending a joint resolution for the investigation of a proposed Nicaraguan canal. I am opposed to the passage of that joint resolution, but I have no desire to delay its consideration. Neither have I any desire to choose between it and the naval appropriation bill as such.

When the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution shall be before the Senate for discussion, I propose to discuss it, and to discuss only that measure and the subjects connected with it. I do not expect unduly to delay a vote on the joint resolution. I myself may want to spend an hour or slightly longer in discussing the joint resolution, and there may be other Senators who will want to discuss it. For that reason I did not want to enter into any agreement to limit debate before the discussion shall have been opened and before the field of discussion shall have been determined upon. For that reason also I have repeatedly objected to a time limit being set on the debate on the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I appreciate the sentiment the Senator has expressed and I know that he proposes to follow out the policy which he has indicated, which will assure a final vote on the joint resolution; but I do want to draw his attention to the fact that he is not entirely correct in saying that the joint resolution has not been debated. It has been up at two different morning sessions; it was up for two or three hours at an afternoon session, and it has been debated to quite an extent. So when I presented the proposal for a limitation of debate I really thought it was a fair proposition.

Mr. DILL. I remind the Senator, however, that all the discussion practically, with the exception of my own remarks, has been by those who favor the joint resolution. I spoke for about 40 or 45 minutes against the measure, and I was interrupted during a part of that time. The charge in the press is that this is a 1-man filibuster that I am conducting on the Nicaraguan canal joint resolution. I think the joint resolution holds tremendous possibilities, not only of expenditure but as affecting the policy of the Government. I think it is important that those questions be discussed. I am ready to discuss them now. If, however, it is the will of the Senate that it will take up the naval bill, then I have no objection to that; but I did want to make clear my position on the joint resolution. I am not obstructing it and am not desirous of the joint resolution being laid aside, particularly. If it be for the purpose that the naval bill shall be given precedence, I shall have no objection to that.

Mr. EDGE. I want to express my appreciation of the Senator's assurances.

Mr. DILL. But I will not agree to limit the debate before the joint resolution comes before the Senate for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, there will be some discussion of the motion before it shall come to a vote. The naval appropriation bill seeks to include appropriations that will cover not only the five cruisers provided for the first year under the cruiser bill but will also begin the construction of the five cruisers proposed to be laid down during the second year. That presents a far-reaching policy.

The amendment, as I understand, is proposed by the Senate committee over the objections of the Budget Bureau and of the President of the United States. It looks to me like an attempt to jam through appropriations that will tie us fast to the construction of 10 new cruisers, notwithstanding the fact that we might be able to reach an international agreement that will eliminate all of that construction. If what this bill proposes were done, it would tie the hands of the new administration in negotiating disarmament in the future. Therefore the consideration of the bill and of this amendment at this time raises a grave and far-reaching international problem, and it is my purpose to prevent that result if possible.

I think the committee went far afield when it included in this bill appropriations for five of the cruisers the construction of which was postponed for a year in the cruiser bill itself. I should make no objection to the passage of this bill or to its consideration if it proceeded in accordance with the terms of the cruiser bill itself; but that it does not do. It is seeking to crowd these cruisers up a year ahead of time provided in the cruiser bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator explain just what he means by that statement?

Mr. BROOKHART. My statement meant just what it said. I will give some details a little later.

Mr. HALE. Very well; I will wait.

Mr. BROOKHART. Those details will show how the result which I have indicated is to be brought about; but I repeat that it is an attempt to crowd the cruiser construction ahead by a year.

Mr. HALE. Ahead of the program provided by the cruiser bill?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I shall be interested in hearing the Senator's explanation of that.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is crowding construction a year ahead of what would happen if the terms of the cruiser bill were followed; and by doing that, by getting us committed to the construction of 10 new cruisers, the result will be to interfere with any disarmament conference that might be organized.

I think all the world expects the new President of the United States to come forward with a practical scheme of disarmament. He represents good will in the world perhaps as no other man does, and therefore it seems to me there is even a design in this crowding of the cruiser policy. It seems to me that the United States Steel Corporation and those who are more interested in cruisers than they are in America would like to tie his hands. It seems to me they would like to start a construction program that could not reasonably be stopped, or, if it were stopped, could be stopped only to great profit of the Steel Trust itself. Furthermore, it seems to me that the amendment that we are asked now to take up for consideration has cleverly provided for that result.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. As I understand the Senator from Iowa, he is really backing up what the President of the United States has advocated, while those who are asking for the adoption of the amendment are opposing the President of the United States and the President elect as well.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that is true, and I will ask some questions of the chairman of the committee to find out about that. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question about the item on page 45. An increase has been made in the appropriation from $22,750,000 up to $28,550,000. What was the original Budget recommendation in reference to that appropriation?

Mr. HALE. The original recommendation was for $5,800,000 to be added to the bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. The committee have added $5,800,000 over and above the Budget recommendation?

Mr. HALE. No. The Budget recommendation was for $5,800,000; we have adopted the $5,800,000 recommended by the Budget and have taken out $500,000 to start the construction of a second batch of five cruisers.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Budget recommended nothing for that purpose?

Mr. HALE. The Budget recommended nothing for the first batch of cruisers to be constructed under the terms of the cruiser bill in 1929 and added nothing for the second batch to be constructed under the terms of the cruiser bill in 1930. The committee has simply followed out the terms of the cruiser bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the Budget made the estimates on this bill under the direction of the President, did it not?

Mr. HALE. Yes; without regard to the cruiser bill. The specific terms of the cruiser bill were that five of the light cruisers must be started during each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, June 30, 1930, and June 30, 1931.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did the House of Representatives pass the naval appropriation bill before the cruiser bill was passed?

Mr. HALE. The appropriation bill passed the House before the cruiser bill was signed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then, what was it the President and the Budget asked in reference to the cruiser bill?

Mr. HALE. The President submitted the Budget estimates to the President of the Senate, which came to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, for $5,800,000 for armor and armament and $6,000,000 toward construction of five cruisers and one aircraft carrier, and also $570,000 for providing and reconditioning buildings and providing additional equipment and facilities at navy yards and ordnance yards necessary for the construction and equipment of the ships, that amount to be immediately available.

Mr. BROOKHART. That applied to the first five cruisers?

Mr. HALE. It applied to the first five cruisers.

Mr. BROOKHART. There was no request from the President or from the Budget for anything except——

Mr. HALE. Except the first five cruisers; but under the terms recommended by the Budget they were not to be started as provided in the cruiser bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Even the first five were not?

Mr. HALE. No; nothing was said about making any appropriation immediately available so that they could be started this year. They were not to be started until the calendar year 1930; and the Senate simply rectified that.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. May I call attention to the fact that in no case of appropriations for new cruisers does this bill exceed the amounts recommended by the Budget. The only difference is in the application of the amount of $500,000, and in another case $200,000, which is made immediately available.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that on page 45 of the bill, line 17, the suggestion has been made that this clause might be construed—I do not think it would have that effect myself—to allow the immediate construction of the second lot of cruisers. I do not know that there is anything in that suggestion; but to obviate it I am proposing to add an amendment to line 17, after the words "Increase of the Navy," as follows:

> Except the $500,000 available toward the construction of the second five light cruisers, the construction of which is authorized by the act approved February 13, 1929.

That means that none of that $500,000 can be used at all until the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the Senator proposes, even after his amendment is adopted, still to hold the $500,000 for the second series of five cruisers?

Mr. HALE. Oh, certainly. That is in conformity with the terms of the cruiser bill, which states that five must be started in this fiscal year and five in the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is in conformity with the terms of the cruiser bill before those terms arrive.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Maine if it is not a fact that this appropriation bill is so framed that it calls for an appropriation to be expended—a part of it, at least—immediately, or before the 30th of June, with reference to the second five cruisers which are to be started in 1930?

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I think so. Let me answer first. I have the floor, and I will answer first my idea of that. I think, as the bill is prepared, that all of that $28,000,000 is available to be spread over the whole 10 cruisers if they want to do it, and $500,000 of it is specifically allotted to the second series of 5 cruisers. Now the Senator from Maine says he will amend this "immediately available" clause in line 18——

Mr. HALE. Which had to do simply with the question of draftsmen, and so forth.

Mr. BROOKHART. He proposes to amend it so as to restrict it only to the $500,000; but that is still $500,000 on the second series of cruisers.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; it does not restrict it to the $500,000. It restricts it to everything but the $500,000. That was in the estimate that was sent up by the Budget.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator did not understand my inference. The $500,000 applies to the second series of five cruisers.

Mr. HALE. Yes, Mr. President; and I am providing by this amendment that I am going to offer that no part of that $500,000 may be used until the fiscal year 1930, so there can be no question about it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under that provision, what is the use of having it in this bill at all? If we are going to wait until 1930 to use it, let us wait until then to appropriate it.

Mr. HALE. This is the time to legislate for the fiscal year 1930. This is the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. BROOKHART. We will have two sessions of Congress in time to meet that.

Mr. HALE. This is the regular appropriation bill for that year. This is the place for it to go in. If it does not go in here, it will have to go into some deficiency bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. I understand; but the cruiser bill is not the regular thing. It is a very irregular appropriation bill, a very extraordinary appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. The cruiser bill is now the law, the Senator will admit; and it seems to me, as I recollect it, that it was adopted by a very large vote of the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I remember about that vote quite well. The size of the vote, however, does not make any difference about the provisions of the law; and now the Senator, after getting that big vote, thinks he can crowd this thing ahead a year.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think the cruiser bill is the law now?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; and that is what I am following.

Mr. HALE. Are we not following out the law?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; you are not. You are going ahead of the law.

Mr. HALE. I think not.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator will follow the law he will cut out this $500,000, and, with his other amendment, this controversy will end.

Mr. HALE. The $500,000 is simply following out the terms of the law.

Mr. BROOKHART. The law does not call for $500,000.

Mr. HALE. It calls for something to start the ships.

Mr. BROOKHART. In 1930, yes; but not now, in 1929.

Mr. HALE. This is the time when we are legislating for 1930. The bill before us is the 1930 appropriation bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Things are likely to happen in 1930, and we shall be in better shape for a disarmament conference if we have no entanglements over this cruiser program; and therefore there are special and most potent reasons why we should not be appropriating for 1930 in 1929 in connection with this matter.

The Senator will concede, will he not, that we have time enough to appropriate in 1930 the money to take care of this proposition?

Mr. HALE. There are a great many matters in this bill that come up under the 1930 program that we might legislate for later on; but this is the time when we are legislating for that year, and it is entirely proper for us to put in an appropriation of this sort.

Mr. BROOKHART. If these cruisers are laid down at any time in 1930, they will comply with the law; will they not?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. If we are going to have a disarmament conference, it certainly is sensible that we should not start this program until the result of that conference is known.

Mr. HALE. Oh, I think not, Mr. President. I think we shall be in a very much stronger position in the conference if we show that we are really going ahead.

Mr. BROOKHART. Even though we have to junk these ships and pay the Steel Trust a big profit afterwards?

Mr. HALE. There is not the slightest chance in the world that we shall have to scrap any of these ships. The President has already told us about that. We have debated that question on the cruiser bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the President wanted the time limit taken off entirely so that it would not be necessary to build any of the ships in 1930.

Mr. HALE. The President does not believe in time limits.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the Senator from Maine would not listen to the President.

Mr. HALE. Certainly I would not, Mr. President. I think it is the duty of Congress to decide when ships shall be built.

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to commend the Senator from Maine as an insurgent. That is a new proposition, coming from him.

Mr. President, I think the facts as stated illustrate the situation quite clearly. This is an attempt in 1929 to start the appropriations for the cruisers that are to be laid down at any time in 1930. There is no necessity for that to comply with the cruiser law. It is taking time by the forelock, as it were; and I think the taking is not in the interest of the American people so much as it is in the interest of the profiteers who want to build these ships.

That being true, on that ground this matter ought not to be passed now. Especially should it not pass now when we consider the fact that a disarmament conference might have to consider the proposition of junking these ships. I hope it will have to consider the problem of sending to the junk pile all the big ships of the world, so far as that is concerned.

Before, when we held the disarmament conference on battleships, we had to pay a cancellation fee of some $25,000,000 to the contractors who held the contracts for the construction of those ships. Already that policy has been severely criticized on the floor of the Senate and outside, for that matter; and yet this bill and this amendment propose to drive us right into a similar situation again. I think we ought to learn our lesson from that former experience, and now is the time to think about that.

I have no idea that those who are so keen for this appropriation care anything about the little $500,000. That is only a little bit of an item in this bill; but $500,000 is enough to tie us fast to those five cruisers.

The cruiser bill itself provides that these ships shall not be built if the President of the United States can secure a proper international agreement for disarmament.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. Will not the Senator finish quoting from the bill and read the proviso that the President may discontinue construction at any time?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; he discontinued construction on the battleships which we sank, and he paid the Steel Trust and others $25,000,000 to do it.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator has made reference more than once to the so-called Steel Trust, and once by name mentioned the United States Steel Corporation. I believe the Senator is not fully informed or he would not make those allusions. I do not care anything about the Steel Trust; but the Steel Trust does not care anything about these ships, as far as that is concerned. The displacement of the ships is 10,000 tons each. The steel going into them will not exceed six or seven thousand tons each; and the steel for the entire 10 cruisers, 70,000 tons, if it went to that, would not run one of the Steel Corporation's mills for 30 days. So I think the Senator is making a mountain out of a molehill when he refers to any interest of the Steel Trust in the construction of these cruisers.

Mr. BROOKHART. But 30 days is a long time to run the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. PHIPPS. I said one mill of the Steel Corporation. I am speaking of one rolling mill out of half a dozen that may be in the same plant.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Federal Shipbuilding Co., the largest one of all, I believe, is owned by the United States Steel Corporation; and there will be contracts outside of furnishing the steel. The Steel Trust certainly has an interest in carrying out this proposition.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think it is quite fair for any Senator to name any particular corporation in his argument. He may speak of the industry as a whole. The United States Steel Corporation is not the only manufacturer of steel in the United States by any manner of means. It has several large competitors, any one of whom is quite competent to bid at any time on a 70,000-ton order for materials.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would have no objection to putting all their names in the RECORD, so far as I am concerned, but I generally adopt the policy of taking the biggest and most important one. That is why I named this special company. It is doing about half of all the steel business in the United States, and I think it is entitled to prior mention when we come to talk about trusts, and the economic powers that rule our country.

Mr. President, what will be the effect of starting this appropriation as it is provided in this bill, and, if there is not some far-reaching method to tie us fast to these other five cruisers, why not cut off the other $500,000, along with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine and end this controversy? We could still build every one of these ships within the time authorized by the cruiser bill, we could carry out that law in every detail, but for some reason the committee comes in with an amendment which they say they will reduce to $500,000, and they block all of the important business at the end of this session just to get that little $500,000 appropriation, which they do not need.

That fact alone is enough to arouse those, and every one of those who believe that we ought to have an international agreement for disarmament. There is something wrong about a situation that will stand on that narrow margin and that kind of ground. If this did not tie us fast in some way, it would be perfectly agreeable to everybody to drop out that $500,000 item and go ahead with the provisions for the construction of the five cruisers, but as this bill stands now, unless the amendment is adopted, this appropriation could be spread over 10 cruisers at once, and the whole 10 of them could be laid down under the provisions of this bill and before any disarmament conference could be arranged. Then we would be in the embarrassment, possibly, we were in before, of sinking ships that cost vast millions of money or leaving the world armed in a degree which we would not want.

These are some of the reasons why I am opposed to the consideration of this bill now in this form. Let us see how that figures out. The Senate committee bill as proposed carries for new construction under "Increase of the Navy," $12,370,000, divided as follows:

Construction and machinery, $5,800,000.
Armor, armament, and ammunition, $6,000,000.
Improving and equipping navy yards, $570,000.

Making a total of $12,370,000. All of these increases are on account of the new construction work in connection with the cruiser building program as enacted by the Congress in the cruiser law.

The Senate committee amendment on page 45 provides that $500,000 shall be available toward the construction of the second five light cruisers. Then a further amendment provides that all moneys appropriated under this head shall be immediately available. So the bill as it stands now makes all this money available, to be spread over and used in starting or laying down 10 cruisers.

The Senator from Maine, to be fair, says he will offer an amendment to limit that.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. I was going to call the Senator's attention to that. A reading of the entire provision ought to straighten out any misapprehension. It is not the intention that the $12,370,000 shall be immediately available, of course. That is not the intention, and that is not the language.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Maine said that he was willing to offer an amendment that would limit the use of these appropriations, so far as the second series of five cruisers is concerned, to the $500,000; but again I want to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the $500,000 is a little item, and it will get nowhere toward the construction of those cruisers, except to tie us fast to that policy.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. Allow me to read the proviso:

Provided, That appropriations contained in this act on account of "Increase of the Navy" shall be immediately available, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, for the employment of such clerks, draftsmen, and technical employees as may be required at navy yards, in field-inspection offices, and in the Navy Department in the District of Columbia, for the preparation of plans and the work of inspecting and constructing vessels building, such employees to be in addition to those otherwise provided for.

So that it does not for a moment permit the use of $12,370,000 upon the passage of this bill. Only the amount required for these specific purposes, the employing of clerks and draftsmen, is to be made immediately available, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. So that the Senator has evidently misunderstood the purpose of the proviso, which was prepared by the Bureau of the Budget, and not by the committee. The language used is the exact language sent by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. BROOKHART. In connection with the $500,000 item, which the Bureau of the Budget did not send, it opens up all these funds, for all 10 cruisers, if that is desired, although it is employed in particular lines.

Mr. PHIPPS. It is not intended that that $500,000 shall be used until after July 1 next.

Mr. BROOKHART. That does not change the situation. If it is not the intention to use it until after July 1, why have it in here at all? Why have anything in this bill that will open up the question of tieing us fast to that 10-cruiser policy at once? Why not wait until we have plenty of time to appropriate the money in the regular session?

Mr. PHIPPS. It would go over for a year; the regular bill will not become operative until July 1, 1930.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is plenty of time. The money could be appropriated in the regular session next December, and that would be plenty of time.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is the judgment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will ask the Senator, does he not concede that we could appropriate this money in time to comply with the provisions of the cruiser bill in the next regular session of Congress.

Mr. PHIPPS. Not in the next regular session, and I doubt if we could in the expected special session, because the chances are that the House will have no Committee on Appropriations active.

Mr. BROOKHART. When is the second series of cruisers to be laid down?

Mr. PHIPPS. Under the provisions of the cruiser bill, it is provided that the second five should be laid down during the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is, not until the 1st of July, 1930?

Mr. PHIPPS. Until the 1st of July, 1930; that is correct.

Mr. BROOKHART. And Congress will meet in regular session on the first Monday in December, 1929?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct.

Mr. BROOKHART. And if that Congress appropriates the money before the 1st of July, 1930, then it will have complied with the terms of the cruiser bill?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; because the money that would be appropriated in the naval appropriation bill would not become available until the first of the following July, assuming that we passed the bill in December.

Mr. BROOKHART. This appropriation is not in the regular naval appropriation bill. This is a special affair, for the construction of new ships, in a new and separate bill, different from the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. It would have to be a special bill to accomplish the purpose the Senator suggests. In that event, the money would have to be made immediately available.

Allow me to call the Senator's attention to this point: The Senator has been talking while the so-called Nicaraguan canal bill is presumably before the Senate. A motion is pending——

Mr. BROOKHART. I am talking on the motion.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator is discussing the motion. If the Senator will permit a vote upon the motion, and let us proceed with the discussion of the naval appropriation bill, in a very reasonable length of time the points he is now discussing will come up in regular order, and we, with the Senator's assistance, may have a vote on those amendments. If the Senator's contention prevails, certainly the amendments will go out. Otherwise, I should think the Senator would be entirely willing to defer to the views of a majority of the Senate. So, if we may proceed in the regular order, and permit a roll call——

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator insist I am not proceeding in regular order?

Mr. PHIPPS. I think it would be a little more regular if the Senator would permit a vote on the motion now pending.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think it would be still more regular if the committee had followed the cruiser law, and kept this appropriation out of this bill, and kept this controversial question down. As soon as I knew of it I let its sponsors know that I expected to oppose it by every means at my command.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. GLASS. I would like to inquire whether the Senator from Colorado is engaged in a filibuster against his own bill?

Mr. PHIPPS. I hope not; that was not my intention. I only regret that the Senator from Iowa is not in accord with the views of the majority of the committee who have reported the bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Whatever the construction of this amendment may be, with the $500,000 included, this means that money is provided for laying down not 5 but 10 cruisers within a little more than one calendar year. I think there can be no doubt of that conclusion.

Again, I want to say that if that were not the purpose of this, it seems to me everybody could at once agree to take out this $500,000, and amend this bill, so that there would be no objection, and then proceed in the orderly manner which the Senator from Colorado suggests. There are other matters which ought to have attention here during this short session.

Mr. President, I think the committee was justified in bringing in an amendment to the bill which provides for the five cruisers, as the cruiser law commands. I think there is no criticism whatever of the committee that could be made upon that proposition, but here is the other highly controversial question of prematurely starting the next five cruisers, and the committee can not be justified for injecting that proposition into the pending bill and into this situation at this time.

I think the program of starting all 10 of these cruisers in any way is uneconomical. The orderly construction of a ship such as a cruiser covers about 30 to 36 months. The amount of money expended the first year is relatively small, the second year relatively large, and the third year somewhat smaller. A possible allocation on a ship to cost $17,000,000 would be, roughly, $5,500,000 to $6,000,000 for armament and ammunition. Since procurement of guns and ammunition can be carried forward quite independently from the question of the hulls and the machinery, this part of the program would admit of flexible adjustment over a period of 30 to 36 months. This would leave between $11,000,000 and $11,500,000 for hull and machinery for one ship to be expended over a period of 30 to 36 months.

The economic expenditure on one ship of this latter amount would be about as follows: $1,500,000 approximately in the first year. If this appropriation were spread over all 10 ships it would not be quite that much, but it would not be much below it, either. There would then be $6,500,000 to $7,000,000 approximately the second year and $3,000,000 approximately the third year.

It will thus be seen that though the item in the current bill is $12,370,000 or, exclusive of navy-yard improvement, $11,800,000, a very small amount is provided for each of 10 ships. In other words, it is only a little more than $1,000,000 for each ship. That will mean, however, that the Government will be committed to ship construction of all 10 ships, and that is the important point in this argument.

The second year the appropriation upon reasonable rapidity of construction would be ten times $6,500,000 or $7,000,000, or approximately $65,000,000 or $70,000,000. The third year, even if no other new ships were laid down, it would be $30,000,000.

This is an uneconomic method, and a better method would be to spread this cost out as the cruiser bill itself provided. We will only get the first five cruisers started at the last end of the fiscal year 1929. Therefore the next five under the idea of the cruiser bill are to be laid down at the end of 1930 and the last series would be laid down at the end of 1931. If that is to be our order of procedure, then there is no occasion for a 1930 appropriation in this session of Congress nor in the extraordinary session of Congress that will follow. There is plenty of time to do it after the regular session convenes in December of this year. Therefore if there is no other purpose in the bill except to carry out the provisions of the cruiser construction law, there is no occasion for keeping this controversial item in the bill.

If the situation was such that we could not reasonably make the appropriation and take care of the program as the law now provides, then I would not be criticizing the committee for bringing in this amendment against the will of the President of the United States and the Budget and everybody else. But no necessity and no argument is presented to claim in any degree that we need the appropriation now. It is a spider web for entanglement purposes and it might entangle us in a way that would be more far-reaching than we could anticipate at this time.

Of course, I was opposed to the whole cruiser program. I felt then, and I feel now, that it was unwise, so far as our international relations were concerned—extremely unwise, in fact—and I also feel that it is unwise from the standpoint of efficiency itself. These ships will never be used in war. They will be a nuisance that will employ men in a useless occupation during war time.

We will hide them away, or attempt to hide them away, so the submarines and the aircraft may be unable to find them. I realize their importance in international negotiations, because the military idea, or the naval idea, of all the countries is the same as that which existed in the dark ages. The military idea never lets loose of an old thing. It is clinging to many things in the Army and the Navy to-day that are a positive load and a clog in the road of efficiency. The idea of building cruisers is one of them still clung to by the navies of the world. However, it is an efficient way to provide profits for the Steel Trust which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] objects to having me mention, but which I can not refrain from mentioning occasionally. It is an efficient way of providing those plans and of encouraging agencies that believe in war and organization for war. It brings to the support of that idea many elements in business, and even elements in labor, although in justice to labor I want to say that they are opposed to war, even these construction programs that would give them employment are not set down by them as a test for labor support.

Mr. President, the cruiser bill itself directs the President of the United States to enter into international negotiations for disarmament. It authorizes him to discontinue the construction of the cruisers if a suitable arrangement for disarmament can be made. That is the one saving clause in that law; that is the one American idea. I wish all the world would think about that provision of the law, and not remember us for the bloodthirsty policy that was presented in the arguments for the bill during its consideration. I wish they would think of that law as only an aid to an international conference.

Mr. President, I believe that the President elect of the United States will encourage such a conference. The British ambassador has already suggested it, and the British minister of foreign affairs has already said, in answer to interrogatories in Parliament, that the announcement of the British ambassador to the United States is in accord with the ideas of the British cabinet. As the building of these cruisers was against Great Britain, that is a plain indication that Great Britain is ready to talk disarmament.

I want the new administration in the United States to be ready to meet Great Britain halfway, and more than halfway, if necessary, to accomplish that great purpose. I think the one concrete thing along this line that has so far been done was the Washington Disarmament Conference, which actually resulted in the sinking of some of the best battleships in the world. That was a genuine proceeding, though it brought some criticism merely because of the useless and foolish expenditure of money in the first instance for such a purpose.

Again, if we begin the construction of the 10 cruisers, and then get into a disarmament conference which should limit the number of our cruisers below or down to what we already have, once more it will be necessary to take them out into the ocean and sink them to the bottom and sacrifice the vast amount of funds that will have been expended upon them. I had rather put as little embarrassment of that kind as possible upon the new administration; I had rather begin the construction of as few of these ships as is possible. I realize that if we comply with the law we shall have to lay down five of them before the 1st of July. I sincerely hope that this new high-speed-acting President of ours will find some method of inaugurating these negotiations even to the extent of preventing the laying down of the first five of these cruisers. I suspect that the Committee on Naval Affairs, with its bloodthirsty ideas of ships and more ships all the time, are a little bit afraid of something of that kind, and, therefore, they are using excessive speed and excessive energy to amend the naval bill so as to provide for laying down 10 cruisers instead of 5 and tie the hands of the new administration in the greatest possible peace movement, that of disarmament upon the seas.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT AND HIS POLICIES

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, now that this appropriation bill for the upkeep of the Navy is before the Senate, it would seem appropriate to say something about some of the many incidents that are now occurring in Washington.

We read with a good deal of pride and pleasure the fine receptions that were accorded to the President elect as he journeyed forth recently with his army of news correspondents and attendants and censors into Central and South America. Of course, we did not get the news of everything that happened on that cruise or in the many cities visited, but we got a good deal. The fact that we did not get more news was due to the ability and alacrity of the censorial mentor of the party, Mr. George Barr Baker.

Then, when the President elect returned from the sunny climes of South America, where hospitality was showered upon him, and his heart warmed by the plaudits of the people he went to beautiful Florida; and there, too, he received warmth and congratulations of many who had been loyal to him politically in the late campaign. There he basked in the sunshine, rolled in sands along the beach, fished in tepid waters, and had a general good time, playing with the many office seekers gathered there. From the reports we read, all of us thought that we had a real human being as the next President of the United States. Little did we dream that he could ever forget the thrill that comes from real and warm-hearted hospitality. We thought that the time would even come when his political friend of years, my friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], would visit him and pay humble tribute to his majesty. So I am sure that those who have the kindly feelings that I have toward the President elect read with surprise the afternoon papers and the news items of the morning papers saying that the news correspondents, with a foot of snow on the ground, were forced to stand out in front of the residence of the President elect, shivering and freezing, waiting for some piece of news to drop, censored by George Barr Baker.

This picture in the afternoon paper which I hold in my hand, the Washington Daily News, shows three fine young correspondents—Thomas L. Stokes, of the United Press; George Durno, of the International News Service; and Roger Cortesi, of the Associated Press—dressed in woolens, with hands in their pockets, with overcoats and shawls wrapped around them, with the collars of their coats all turned up, no fire anywhere around, bogged down in this snow that is unprecedented this winter in Washington, with no stirring signs of life inside.

It may be that the cloistered gentleman who is warming his feet inside by a great, big log fire, all pleasant and fine, with his office seekers sitting around him, thinks that the country is not concerned as to what is going on inside; but the people of America are anxious to know what their President elect is doing and what is running through his mind with reference to Cabinet appointments, with the 4th of March approaching and only a few days remaining. Why, there are some people who are even interested to know who is going to be the next Attorney General of the United States. Certainly the leaders of the prohibition cause in this country are interested, and certainly the bootleggers are interested, and of course the great middle class are interested.

It may be that Senators are not interested, or at least one Senator, because, if we read correctly, one Senator has been tendered the job of Attorney General and has declined it. That is the best act the President elect has done, if it is true; and if he does appoint the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], it will be the best appointment he will make during the four years he will serve as President of the United States.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Washington will permit me, if it had not been for these correspondents shivering and freezing in the cold outside, unattended save, perhaps, by an occasional censored message from George Barr Baker, the country never would have known that this tender had come to the distinguished Senator from Idaho. Certainly we would not have known that on last evening he sauntered forth to the residence of the President elect, and was cloistered there in secrecy talking over these great matters of state.

If it had not been for these correspondents, forced, as they were, to remain outside on the streets, shivering and freezing in a foot of snow, the country, perhaps, would not have learned that my good friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the next leader in this body of the majority party, had rekindled the old fires of love for the President elect, and that now they were Bobbie Shealeys in a common cause.

So these correspondents are playing an important part, and on this occasion I feel like extending sympathy to them, and expressing the hope that at least the President elect will send outside to them some kindling wood so that these boys can build up a little fire not only to keep themselves from freezing but apply some warmth to the cold and disappointed office seekers that leave the chilly presence of the President elect.

I know that the President elect is concerned about his own comfort and convenience when he becomes President, because we are informed that already he has recommended to the committee of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] an appropriation of $200,000 to make larger the Executive Offices, so that he might provide more and plenty of room for the two new assistant secretaries he requests; and, of course, whatever else he asks of my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], he will receive, because he is one of the few Senators here who recently has felt his warm touch and succumbed to the embrace of his extraordinary hospitality.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi did not tell us whether or not these newspaper boys had notified the President elect in advance that they would be there at that early hour or whether he knew they were out there quietly waiting, shivering in the cold. It is a matter of great national interest as to whether they really suffered while waiting to see Mr. Hoover. And the paramount question now appears to be, Did they see him? [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, we are always interested when the Senator from Mississippi makes a speech, particularly a jocular address, or one in facetious vein. I wish I could be teased into following him into that very delightful field to which he tauntingly invites me, but there are other days coming, and I am so deeply interested in the passage of the pending measure that I can not for five minutes be tempted into any sort of filibuster myself.

I do not know whether or not the newspaper boys were standing outside in the cold; I know nothing about the depth of the snow in which their feet may have been encased, if I may be permitted to use the term, but I will say this to my good friend from Mississippi, whose friendship I so particularly enjoy, that after the next administration shall have begun we are going to make it so entirely warm for my friend that there will be no snow in which anybody need stand.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. Surely.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator think that it is especially unfortunate that the only snow that the Capital has had this year should be marred by the incident that has been described by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WATSON. This is a sort of playful mood in which we all find ourselves at this time, but we all know that when the President elect went South he had but little opportunity to study the problems that confronted him or to deal with the questions he had to solve. He found it necessary to come back where he could get that companionship and that advice and that counsel which he is seeking and which he intends to seek in the future. It was the most natural thing in the world for him to do that thing.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that he got that companionship and advice and counsel when the Senator from Utah journeyed forth to Florida and remained there with the President elect for several days?

Mr. NEELY rose.

Mr. WATSON. Undoubtedly he got all that he wanted from the Senator from Utah, who always is familiar with all public questions, and whose advice we nearly all take because it is always sound and sane when he sees fit to give it. But, in addition to that——

Mr. NORRIS. Is he not sound and sane at other times? [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I said that the Senator's advice was sound and sane.

Mr. President, I did not have the pleasure of journeying after the President elect down to Florida, but I have no doubt that he found pleasure and recreation there while attending to some of the duties of the position which immediately confronts him, he not yet being President of the United States.

I want to say this in all seriousness, because my friend, though he did not bring it up in a serious vein, invites for one moment a serious discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator goes to that, he does not want to create the impression upon the minds of Senators here that he is not in the confidence of the President elect, does he?

Mr. WATSON. That the Senator from Mississippi is not?

Mr. HARRISON. No; that the Senator from Indiana is not.

Mr. WATSON. I think I am. If not, I hope to be.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course the Senator is.

Mr. WATSON. I think I am, and therefore I think I speak with some knowledge of the subject when I say that the President elect is giving as earnest and as serious consideration to the problems with which he will have to deal, both as to men and as to measures, as any man who has been elected to that position in my time, and that runs back a good many years. I think that when he comes into the office of President of the United States he is coming into it as thoroughly armed and equipped for the efficient discharge of his duties as any man who has taken that position in the Senator's day or in mine.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. Surely.

Mr. BLAINE. The voice of the Senator sounds ominous and menacing to some. He suggested that after the 4th of March it would be so hot around here that we would not find any snow in Washington.

Mr. WATSON. I was referring to my Democratic friends.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator intimate that the President elect is going to consign the Senator from Mississippi to the lower regions?

Mr. WATSON. Well, I am reminded that water seeks its level.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Does the distinguished Senator from Indiana think that Mr. Hoover will make it hotter for Democrats after the 4th of March than he made it for Republican presidential candidates before and during the Kansas City convention?

Mr. WATSON. I should think so.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator this: He will not make it any hotter for me than he has for some of the Cabinet members of the Coolidge administration, will he?

Mr. WATSON. As to that, I am not advised. I am not in the confidence of the President elect as to his Cabinet selections, nor have I sought to be. I have no doubt that when he selects a Cabinet and presents the names here it will be found that the men are of such character, and men who have rendered such service, and are so conspicuous in their various fields of activity that we shall be glad immediately and unanimously to confirm them. Now, this talk was started in a facetious vein——

Mr. HARRISON. I thought what the Senator was saying was facetious.

Mr. WATSON. And I want to say to my friend from Mississippi that we will have abundant time in which to discuss all these questions, jocularly if he pleases, facetiously if he likes, but seriously, as he and I sometimes will want to discuss public questions. I believe that in the future, as in the past, the conduct of the Republican Party in public life will be such that the ranks of the Democratic Party will be thinned by those who continue in the future, as in the last election, to support the policies and measures and leaders of the Republican Party, and with that I am now content.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator rose to furnish a little kindling wood to warm up these newspaper boys outside. Will he not say something about that now?

Mr. WATSON. I prefer to see them privately.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts—Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel," on page 25, line 2, before the word "available," to insert "and made immediately," so as to read:

In all, for pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel, $154,512,782, of which sum $578,500 shall be charged to the unexpended balance of the appropriation "Pay, subsistence, and transportation, Navy, 1928," which is continued and made immediately available for such purposes; and the money herein specifically appropriated and made available for "Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel," shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Yards and Docks—Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 31, line 4, after the word "One," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$4,000"; in line 13, after the word "One," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500"; and in line 14, before the word "each," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$1,500," so as to read:

For the labor, materials, and supplies necessary, as determined by the Secretary of the Navy, for the general maintenance of the activities and properties now or hereafter under the cognizance of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, including the purchase, exchange (including parts), maintenance, repair, and operation of passenger-carrying vehicles for the Navy Department (not to exceed 10 in number) and the Naval Establishment not otherwise provided for, and including not to exceed $1,150,000 for clerical, inspection, drafting, messenger, and other classified work in the field, $7,639,300: Provided, That during the fiscal year 1930, the motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be purchased hereunder shall not exceed the following respective numbers and costs: One $4,000, 5 at $2,000 each, 10 at $1,500 each, 28 at $650 each, 10 motor cycles at $450 each, and 5 motor busses at $3,800 each: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall sell, or exchange in part payment for such new vehicles to cost $1,200 or more, the following respective numbers of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles in use and of makes which now cost in excess of the following respective prices per vehicle to replace: One $2,500, 5 at $1,500 each, and 10 at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Increase of the Navy," on page 45, line 7, after the word "authorized," to strike out "$22,750,000" and insert "$28,550,000, of which $500,000 shall be available toward the construction of the second five light cruisers, the construction of which is authorized by the act approved February 13, 1929, to be undertaken during the fiscal year 1930," so as to read:

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, $28,550,000, of which $500,000 shall be available toward the construction of the second five light cruisers, the construction of which is authorized by the act approved February 13, 1929, to be undertaken during the fiscal year 1930, and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make transfers during the fiscal year 1930 from the naval supply account fund to this appropriation of sums aggregating $2,000,000, and the total sum hereby made available shall remain available until expended.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of making a point of order, but before making the point of order, I desire to set forth the reasons why I think the point of order ought to be made.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will not the Senator state the point of order he has in mind?

Mr. BLAINE. It will be a point of order against amendments in an appropriation bill containing new and general legislation. The point of order will refer to the rule of the Senate covering that matter.

I notice that in the act authorizing the 15 cruisers it is provided that—

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to undertake, prior to July 1, 1931, the construction of 15 light cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier, according to the following program.

The "following program" is five light cruisers during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, a like number in 1930, and a like number in 1931. That is the specific authorization—five cruisers for each of the three years 1929, 1930, and 1931.

The amendment proposes, under the heading "Increase of the Navy"—

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, $28,550,000, of which $500,000 shall be available toward the construction of the second five light cruisers.

The vessels that have heretofore been authorized consist of 15 light cruisers. They are authorized, but they are divided into three classes, yet the authorization stands for the three years.

The amendment proposed is to permit the use of $28,550,000 for hulls and the outfitting of vessels and machinery for vessels so authorized, not only the 15 authorized but as well cruisers that are already in the course of construction prior to the authorization of a few days ago, except with reference to that class of five cruisers for the fiscal year 1930, where there is a limitation of $500,000. But there is no limitation upon the Navy Department or those who will administer this law with respect to the $28,050,000. That can be used under the terms of the bill and the amendment on all of the cruisers, on those which have been authorized prior to the recent authorization and on the cruisers authorized for the year 1929 and 1930, the limitation being only on the class for 1930 or a limitation of $500,000.

Therefore, Mr. President, the bill and amendment propose an entirely different set-up for construction and go beyond the authorization of the bill, go into the year 1931, and the Navy Department or those administering the law may take the $28,050,000 and use it for a purpose not authorized by the act passed a few days ago—that is, use it in the present construction of cruisers which have not been authorized until the year 1931, thereby changing the general law.

Therefore, I make the point of order that the Committee on Appropriations may not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator explain why he thinks this would allow the department to proceed to use the appropriation for the construction of 10 or 15 new cruisers?

Mr. BLAINE. For all vessels that are authorized, and the limitation is on the class for 1930 only, and that is a limitation of $500,000.

Mr. HALE. There is $22,750,000 provided in the House bill, and that refers not to these cruisers, but, in part, to eight cruisers that were already authorized and are now in process of construction. It refers partly to them and partly to the three submarines which were authorized under the law of 1916. What we have done is to add to this the $5,800,000 as recommended by the Budget, and it is exactly what is recommended by the Budget to take care of the first five cruisers. The committee has further provided that $500,000 shall be taken out of that $5,800,000 and applied to the second lot of cruisers, but, as I explained to the Senator from Iowa this afternoon, I am proposing to amend, in line 17, page 45 of the bill, by adding the following words:

Except the $500,000 available toward the construction of the second five cruisers, the construction of which is authorized by the act approved February, 1929.

So there can be no question that these cruisers can be constructed at the present time.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know what was in the minds of the Committee on Appropriations. I do not know what was in the minds of the Bureau of the Budget. I am not dealing with what might have been in their minds or what was in their minds. I am directing my point of order to the bill as it now provides, namely, on account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized. That includes all of them. There is no limitation on the eight earlier authorized.

Mr. HALE. I explained to the Senator that the eight were taken care of.

Mr. BLAINE. And the 15 are taken care of in this bill, too. Ten of them are already authorized, except that the limitation is upon the class of 1930, and that limitation is $500,000. The language can not be plainer. It really does not subject itself to interpretation. "All authorized" means all that have been authorized, the 8 and the 15. They are all authorized. There is no dispute about that, and therefore the bill proposes to begin upon the construction not only of those already under construction but as well the 15 cruisers authorized by the recent act.

Mr. HALE. I think in view of the fact that the Budget estimate provides for the first five cruisers alone, and it is so affirmatively stated in the letter from the Director of the Budget, there is no merit in the point of order raised by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. We can not legislate here on the basis of a letter from the Bureau of the Budget. When this body legislates the interpretation must be taken from the language of the bill itself and not from a letter which some other department of the Government may have written.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. In view of what the Senator from Maine has said, I would like to call attention to the fact that the appropriation bill is for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930. It contains an appropriation in the amendment against which the Senator from Wisconsin has made his point of order providing for $500,000 toward the construction of five cruisers which under the law can not be built until 1931.

Mr. HALE. No; in the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator has gone beyond that in the bill and has proposed to appropriate $500,000 for the second batch of cruisers.

Mr. HALE. That is for 1930 and not 1931.

Mr. NORRIS. We are not authorized under the act to which the Senator refers to do that thing, as I understand the law.

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes; we are authorized to do just that thing. Five are to be commenced before July 1, 1929, five are to be commenced before July 1, 1930, and five are to be commenced before July 1, 1931. It is the second five we are providing for in this bill under the terms of the cruiser bill.

Mr. BLAINE. The language of the authorization is five light cruisers during each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, 1930, and 1931. Those have all been authorized, but by classes of five to be built in each fiscal year. Now the Senator from Maine proposes in an appropriation bill to begin the construction of all of the 15 cruisers with the exception of the limitation of $500,000 placed upon those in 1930. That is the plain language of the bill.

Mr. HALE. It could not be done under the law, because the law provides that they shall be started at that time and not before.

Mr. BLAINE. The point of order I am making is that the committee is changing the general law and is permitting it to be done. They are proposing to permit the 15 cruisers to be begun in 1929. There is no question about that.

Mr. HALE. I deny that.

Mr. BLAINE. I am talking about the plain language of the proposal. I know what is in the Senator's mind, but we can not legislate the Senator's mind into this bill. I am sorry sometimes that that might not be done, but it can not be done under our Constitution. The entire 15 cruisers were authorized and the Navy Department may begin the construction the very moment the President signs this bill under the present authorization, except the $500,000 only shall be available toward the construction of the five cruisers in 1930.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator might possibly be right, though I do not think he would be right even then, if we had already authorized the 15 cruisers unconditionally. We have authorized 15 cruisers, but we have only authorized them under the provisions of the cruiser law, that only five may be built each year for three years and therefore we are not authorized to go ahead with the construction of more than five cruisers a year. We are authorized to go ahead with the construction of those for 1929 and that we have provided for. We are also authorized to go ahead with those provided for 1930 because we have come to the time when we must pass the annual appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1930. The last five we are not yet authorized to construct and therefore could not go ahead with them. Therefore I claim the Senator's point of order is not well taken.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator perceive that even an appropriation bill, if it is not challenged, if it goes through and becomes a law, may repeal a prior positive statute? The Senator has called attention to the fact that the cruiser bill which we have passed provided for the construction or undertaking, to use the language of the bill as I recall it, of the five cruisers in three successive years. That is a statute, but I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that this amendment would amend that statute.

Mr. HALE. I do not agree with the Senator at all.

Mr. KING. The Senator is attempting in an appropriation bill to amend a positive statute which we enacted only a few weeks ago. The Senator must concede that an appropriation bill, if it is enacted into law without challenge, can repeal a pre-existing statute.

Mr. HALE. It can, but this particular one does not. This one refers to the cruisers heretofore authorized, and refers to the terms under which they were authorized, and under those terms we are limited in the construction of the cruisers.

Mr. KING. The Senator admits, does he not, that an appropriation bill may repeal a prior law; that is to say, in an appropriation bill there may be incorporated a provision which will repeal a prior law.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Even if it is not cognate to the matter discussed or considered in an appropriation bill. If it may repeal a former statute, then the only question is, Does this directly or indirectly, by implication or specifically, repeal any of the provisions of the cruiser act? I think it does.

Mr. HALE. My contention is that it does not.

Mr. KING. I think the language is sufficiently broad to authorize the commencement of the construction of the second five cruisers. There seems to be no limitation upon the amount of the $28,000,000, which may be used for that purpose. With that construction, it seems to me, to be very clear that this is an attempt upon an appropriation bill to modify an existing statute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Earlier in the day when this bill came up for consideration first the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] demanded the reading of the bill and objected to the unanimous-consent request submitted by the Senator from Maine. The bill was not read in full. We were only part way through with it when the morning hour expired. My inquiry is, Under that order should not the bill be read before the amendments are taken up? Unanimous consent has not been given to dispense with the reading of the bill. It has not even been requested since then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be resumed, and the amendments will be voted on as they are reached.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand what the Chair said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The legislative clerk resumed the reading of the bill at the top of page 26, beginning with the item "Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," and read down to the end of line 2, on page 33.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I am going to make a request which I think will result in disposing of the pending bill and at the same time be fair to everyone concerned. I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill shall be closed to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock and that after the hour of 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon debate shall be limited to 10 minutes on the bill and 10 minutes on any amendment to it. Then when the Senate concludes its business this afternoon it may adjourn, or take a recess, or have an executive session, as may be desired.

Mr. KING. The proposal of the Senator from Virginia is agreeable to me.

Mr. HALE. It is agreeable to me.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to it, but there are only a few Senators present, and I think in fairness the roll should be called.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Utah has spoken to other Senators about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The agreement suggested by the Senator from Virginia does not fix a definite time for a vote, and, consequently, a roll call is not necessary under the rule.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not fix a definite time for a vote, but I think we ought to have a roll call, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bingham	Glass	Moses	Smoot
Black	Glenn	Neely	Steck
Blaine	Goff	Norbeck	Steiwer
Bratton	Hale	Norris	Stephens
Brookhart	Harris	Nye	Swanson
Broussard	Harrison	Oddie	Thomas, Idaho
Capper	Hastings	Overman	Thomas, Okla.
Caraway	Hawes	Phipps	Trammell
Couzens	Hayden	Pittman	Tydings
Curtis	Heflin	Ransdell	Tyson
Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.	Vandenberg
Deneen	Jones	Sackett	Wagner
Dill	Kendrick	Schall	Walsh, Mass.
Fess	King	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Frazier	McKellar	Shipstead	Warren
George	McMaster	Shortridge	Waterman
Gerry	McNary	Simmons	Watson
Gillett	Mayfield	Smith

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the Senate a proposed unanimous-consent agreement that to-morrow, after the reading of the Farewell Address of George Washington, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the pending bill, and that after 3 o'clock on that calendar day all debate shall be limited to 10 minutes on the bill and 10 minutes on each amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted severally on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to each of the following bills of the House, and that Mr. SMITH, Mr. LEATHERWOOD, and Mr. LANKFORD were appointed managers on the part of the House at the respective conferences:

H. R. 6496. An act granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of New Mexico and Oklahoma with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Cimarron River and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested;

H. R. 6497. An act granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Texas with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Rio Grande, Pecos, and Canadian or Red Rivers, and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested;

H. R. 6499. An act granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of New Mexico and Arizona with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Gila and San Francisco Rivers and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested;

H. R. 7025. An act granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of Colorado, Oklahoma, and Kansas with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Arkansas River and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7452) for the erection of a tablet or marker to be placed at some suitable point at Alfords Bridge, in the county of Hart, State of Georgia, on the national highway between the States of Georgia and South Carolina, to commemorate the memory of Nancy Hart.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16422) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 36 to the bill, and concurred therein.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to each of the following bills:

S. 3848. An act creating the Mount Rushmore National Memorial Commission and defining its purposes and powers; and

S. 3936. An act to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia.

R. 13981) to permit the United States to be made a party defendant in certain cases, agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. DYER, and Mr. SUMNERS of Texas were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

IMMIGRATION QUOTAS BASED ON NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] before the Senate Committee on Immigration regarding the Nye resolution to postpone effectuation of the national-origins clause of the immigration law.

In view of the fact that this resolution may be debated before the Senate in a few days, I ask that these remarks be printed in the body of the RECORD. They constitute an able analysis of the report of three Cabinet officials who investigated the results of regulating immigration by means of the national-origins plan.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. HENRIK SHIPSTED BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION REGARDING THE NYE RESOLUTION TO POSTPONE EFFECTUATION OF NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE

Senator SHIPSTEAD. On two previous occasions the Committee on Immigration has been called upon to examine the report of the three Cabinet officials based upon their investigations through statistical reports. On both occasions your committee has refused to accept the report. The reasons given to the Senate for refusing to accept the report are contained in the following statement by the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, February 1, 1927:

"I desire to say that under the present immigration law the President is required to promulgate a proclamation on the 1st day of April, 1927, in respect to the national-origins provisions of the law.

"Upon this subject two messages have been received by the Senate. The last of those messages states that figures relied upon for the quota numbers of various countries are ambiguous and that practical legislation could not be predicated upon them."

And further he says:

CLARIFICATION OF DATA CONSIDERED IMPOSSIBLE

"I violate no confidence, I think, in saying to the Senator from Missouri that the majority of the Immigration Committee desired to repeal the national origins law, but there being a minority in favor of it and our time being so limited, we felt that we could not at this time have definitive action.

"The resolution passed the Senate, came before the Immigration Committee of the House, and a majority of the committee reporting the resolution to the House reported, in part, as follows:

"'The committee having considered the text of Senate Joint Resolution 152, to postpone for one year the going into effect of the national-origins provision of the immigration act of 1924, is of the opinion that at the end of one year from July 1, 1927, the same uncertainty as to the results of regulating immigration by means of the national-origins plan will continue to exist.

"'That the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor will have little, if any more, positive evidence on which to base quota findings than at present.

"'That too much uncertainty exists as to the requirements of the law that "the President shall issue a proclamation on or before April 1, 1927," when read in conjunction with further provisions of the law.

"'That it seems far better to have immigration quotas for the purposes of restriction fixed in such a manner as to be easily explained and easily understood by all.

"'That the committee is of the opinion that the United States, having started on a policy of numerical restriction, the principle of which is well understood, that little will be gained by changing the method.'

"I take it for granted that your committee has again refused to accept the report of the fact-finding commission appointed by the President according to law. I base that upon the fact that the committee has decided to hold public hearings."

LAW OF 1924 SPECIFIC

Under the provisions of the immigration law of 1924 the commission composed of the Secretaries of State, Labor, and Commerce and the task of determining the national origin of the population of the United States. The specific instruction of the law to this commission reads as follows:

"Such determination shall not be made by tracing the ancestors of descendants of particular individuals, but shall be based upon statistics of immigration and emigration, together with rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses, and such other data as may be found to be reliable."

You will note that the mandate is quite specific in its limitations upon the commission. The purpose of this provision of the law was to create a fact-finding commission. The commission is instructed by law to confine their source of information to "immigration and emigration" statistics, "together with rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses, and such other data as may be found to be reliable."

The law specifies these three sources of information upon which to find the facts. The report is here; in fact, it is here for the third time by request of the committee for the purpose of determination by your committee as to whether or not the commission has complied with the provisions of the law in its search for facts and if the facts reported are of such a character that the committee in its judgment feels they are sufficient and substantial enough to form the foundation of the immigration policy of the United States.

It must be clear to everyone that the limitations conferred by law upon the fact-finding commission extend also to the Committee on Immigration in this case. The committee sits in a judicial capacity in judgment on the report, and the report of the commission must form the foundation of your decision. Under the law it seems plain that the committee is confined to the report of the commission. It therefore becomes important to learn what is the foundation of the commission's report.

Therefore I call the committee's attention to the testimony of the chairman of the commission's "experts," whose duty it is to report to the commission of three Cabinet officials in order that we may learn upon what their report is founded.

CENSUS OF 1790 BASIS OF REPORT

On page 14 of Senate document dated March 15, 1928, and designated as "Hearing before the Committee on Immigration, United States Senate, Seventieth Congress, first session," we read the following:

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Doctor, upon reading the report I got the idea that the census of 1790 plays a very important part in your report.

"Doctor HILL. Yes; that is true.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. It is almost a foundation for the entire report, as I read it.

"Doctor HILL. Well, you are talking now about the census record, not about the century of population growth?

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. I am talking about the census record; and the century of population growth is based, as I understand it, upon the census of 1790?

"Doctor HILL. Yes.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. So the census of 1790 becomes the key to the arch of the whole basis of calculation, as I understand the report. I wanted to know if that is your idea.

"Doctor HILL. Yes; for that part of the population which we call the original native stock, representing about 45 per cent of the total.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Can you tell us how many or what percentage of the statistics gathered in that report were destroyed when the British burned the Capitol here?

"Doctor HILL. Well, the records for New Jersey, Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, and Tennessee. These records have been lost, but it is not altogether certain that they were destroyed when the British burned the Capitol, although that is the tradition.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. It was given at one time as something like six or seven States of which the statistics were burned at that time, so given by one of the Commissioners of Immigration.

"Senator COPELAND. Does the Senator mean that the records relating to those States were burned?

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Yes."

In Senate document, dated December 22, 1926, and designated "Hearings Before the Committee on Immigration, United States Senate, Sixty-ninth Congress, Second Session," on page 4, while making a statement on the provisions of the law specifying the source of information upon which the commission was instructed to base its conclusion, I made the following statement:

"* * * Such determination shall not be made by tracing the ancestors or descendants of particular individuals, but shall be based upon statistics of immigration and emigration, together with rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses and such other data as may be found to be reliable."

It will be seen from the above that the most important element in this determination is "statistics of immigration and emigration." The next important element is "rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses."

As reliable statistics of immigration and emigration are not in existence, the whole plan fails and leaves the determination to mere guesswork or conjecture.

"Senator REED. In the absence of statistics, you say?

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I say 'reliable statistics' are not available. According to the best authorities, there are no reliable statistics of immigration for the first 213 years of this country's history. I believe you stated in the debate upon this proposition that there were none until 1820?

"Senator REED. Yes.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. I am quoting from your statement on the floor of the Senate, April 3, 1924, page 5460, part 6, volume 65, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: 'There was no official governmental record of immigration commenced until the year 1820.'"

Dr. Edward McSweeney, former Assistant Commissioner of Immigration, has made a statement on that, and if you would care to have me do so I would like to read it. He said [reading]:

"In 1819 a law was passed making it necessary for the captains of all incoming ships bringing passengers to the United States to file a manifest of the passengers, but except to give the number of the passengers to the Government was never other than perfunctory and almost never used. These accumulated manifests were burned in the Ellis Island fire of 1896. The first real attempt to gather immigration statistics was after the Immigration Bureau was established in the early nineties."

In 1906 Congress passed a law providing that the Director of the Census be authorized and directed to publish in permanent form, by counties and minor subdivisions, the names of the families returned at the first census of the United States in 1790.

Speaking of the difficulties in this work, William S. Rossiter, then chief clerk of the Census Bureau, stated in Outlook for December 29, 1906, page 1071, marshals in the different districts who had charge of the census:

"The break in official records is one of the marks of the teeth of the British lion, these papers and many others having been destroyed during the occupation of Washington in the War of 1812."

Mr. Rossiter also states:

"Vagaries of size, shape, paper, ruling, chirography, and language could easily be forgiven if, however, thereby we could restore the missing schedules for Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, New Jersey, Tennessee, and Virginia, another reminder of the British, for they were also destroyed during the occupation of Washington."

Mr. Rossiter estimates that one-fourth of the enumeration is now lacking and that it would be very difficult to comply with the law of 1906.

Director of the Census North was not seemingly deterred by the fact that such a large part of the records was missing, and proceeded in 1909 to make a voluminous report which not only used the partial records but gave meticulous percentages of the racial divisions in the country based solely on names, the same as the late Senator Lodge has done in his Distribution of Ability in 1896. Well, certainly the recklessness of that would be apparent; for instance, here is a man by the name of Murphy; suppose he marries a girl of German descent.

What would the children be? If you go by name, of course, they would be called Irish; the German would be wiped out. If an Irish girl should marry a man with a German name, a Scotch name, or Scandinavian name the Irish descent would be wiped out.

These fragmentary statistics of immigration and emigration are, therefore, admitted by the chairman of "experts" to be the foundation of their report. One-half of the records of the census of 1790 were destroyed more than 100 years before the commission began its work. In the census of 1790 the only information gathered by the census takers was the name and age of the individual. No information was gathered to determine their national origin. The only manner in which the national origin could be determined of the population of 1790 would be from the remaining records of the seven remaining States. Six are gone and the only manner in which the national origin of the remainder can be determined is by tracing the national origin of each individual of the population at that time by spelling or sound of his name. This is "tracing the ancestors of descendants of particular individuals," but the law creating the committee of experts says "such determination shall not be made by tracing the ancestors or descendants of particular individuals, but shall be based upon statistics of emigration and immigration, together with rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses, and such other data as may be found to be reliable."

It seems plain and must be patent to the committee that the census of 1790 is specifically eliminated from consideration in this work by specific provision of the law. It is plain, in view of the statement of Doctor Hill that the census of 1790 is the foundation of his report that this evidence places the report in an indefensible position. There remains, then, (a) "Statistics of immigration and emigration."

RECORDS FROM 1819 TO 1896 BURNED

On April 4, 1924, page 5460, part 6, volume 65, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I find the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]:

"There was no official governmental record of immigration commenced until the year 1820."

The immigration statistics provided for by law in the year 1819 were burned in the Ellis Island fire of 1896. As to the reliability of these records, Dr. Edward McSweeney, former Assistant Commissioner of Immigration, said:

"In 1819 a law was passed making it necessary for the captains of all incoming ships bringing passengers to the United States to file a manifest of the passengers, but, except to give the number of the passengers to the Government, was never other than perfunctory and almost never used. These accumulated manifests were burned in the Ellis Island fire of 1896. The first real attempt to gather immigration statistics was after the Immigration Bureau was established in the early nineties."

Therefore the immigration statistics up until the early nineties were "perfunctory and almost never used," and what there was of them were destroyed by the Ellis Island fire in 1896. These immigration statistics are therefore eliminated not only by the provisions of the law on account of unreliability but also by the fire.

There remains, then, for the consideration of the committee "the rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses and such other data as may be found to be reliable." It is hard to understand what effect "the rate of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses" can have upon the determination of the national origin of the American population so long as no information bearing upon national origin of the American population was gathered by the Census Bureau until 1850, and the Census Bureau did not gather any statistics on the origin of parents that were complete until 1890.

NO NATIONAL-ORIGIN CENSUS RECORD UNTIL 1890

I desire to call the committee's attention to Doctor Hill's testimony in Senate document designated as "Hearing Before the Committee on Immigration, United States Senate, Seventieth Congress, First Session," March 15, on page 19:

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Doctor, have we got the returns for 1800?

"Doctor HILL. Have we got them?

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

"Doctor HILL. There are some States missing still. States for which the 1800 census records are missing include Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, New Jersey, Tennessee, and Virginia, and certain limited areas in some other States; also Indian Territory and Northwest Territory.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. There were six or seven missing out of 1790.

"Senator WILLIS. I was wondering whether or not that might not be a check worth while. Our committees made these computations on the basis of the census of 1790. Suppose they should start an entirely independent inquiry, taking the census of 1800 and 1810 and see where they come out. It would be a pretty useful check, would it?

"Senator COPELAND. Up as far as 1830 it would be, Doctor Hill. That would be a very large undertaking, a very large task, especially as we would have to work with manuscript records. We haven't printed these schedules as we have those of 1790.

"Senator WILLIS. You say you have not any printed record for the census for the earlier periods?

"Doctor HILL. I mean by that the original records. Of course, we have census reports giving statistics.

"Senator WILLIS. Seventeen hundred and ninety was printed; 1800 was not, or 1810?

"Doctor HILL. No; nor has any later census been printed.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Can you tell me the first census we took in which we undertook to find out what country these people came from?

"Doctor HILL. 1850.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. There was nothing done up until that time by our enumerators to determine where those people came from in Europe?

"Doctor HILL. That is true.

"Senator COPELAND. In 1850 did they go back further than the immediate parents?

"Doctor HILL. It did not go back as far as that; simply their own birthplace; whether foreign born, and in what countries.

"Senator COPELAND. When did they begin to ask anything about the parents?

"Doctor HILL. They made a beginning in 1880; but, as I stated a while ago, that was not a complete classification. The first complete classification made of parents was in 1890.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Then until 1850 there was nothing to show except by assuming from the names?

"Doctor HILL. Well, we have the figures, you know.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Were there any other immigration figures other than those required by the Government to be filed by the officers of incoming ships with the immigration officers, the number of passengers, and that the passengers landed were accredited to the flag carried by the ship?

"Doctor HILL. I think you are right about that. I am not familiar with the immigration regulations of those days.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. So, if the ship came in carrying passengers from all over Europe, assume she had a thousand passengers, the officer would file with the immigration department a manifest showing that a thousand came here, and that German ship and immigration officials would accredit those immigrants to Germany; is that right?

"Senator REED. I doubt whether there was any ship of that capacity at that time.

"Senator SHIPSTEAD. Of course, the figure I assumed merely for the purpose of illustration. For instance, an English ship coming in under the English flag, carrying passengers from all over Europe, the passengers would be accredited to England?

"Senator WILLIS. The way they handled ships in those days that would not be a bad guess, because they did not have tramp vessels gathering up cargo. A ship was laden and went to a certain port.

"Senator REED. Your conclusions upon that were checked, were they not, by statistics of emigrants from various countries?

"Doctor HILL. So far as we could get them."

In Doctor Hill's last report he says:

"In order to utilize the available date to best advantage in the determination of national origin it was necessary first of all to deter what proportion of the white population of the United States in 1920 was derived from the white population present in the United States when the first census was taken in 1790."

Suppose that it were possible to determine what percentage of the population of 1920 was descended from the population prior to 1790, what bearing could that have on the national origins of the population of 1920 unless we had some definite immigration and census records informing us on what was the national origins of the population prior to 1790?

On page 2 of Doctor Hill's last report we learn:

"The national origin of the original native or colonial stock is assumed to be the same as that of the 1790 population. In its preliminary report, submitted in 1926, the quota committee accepted the classification of 1790 population by nationalities as given in A Century of Population Growth, a work published by the Bureau of the Census in 1909. It was admitted, however, that there was a 'considerable element of uncertainty' in a classification based as that was upon the names of heads of families."

On page 4 of the last report and the one now pending we find that one of the experts explains the method of determining the national origins of the population of 1790. This shows plainly that the committee of experts' report is based on A Century of Population Growth, which again is based on the census of 1790, and the only excuse for basing the quotas on the census of 1790 and the only scientific thing about it is that they determine the national origin of the population of 1790 by tracing or by guessing the national origin of the individual using his name as a basis. This method was considered so unscientific at the time of the passage of the immigration act that the Congress specifically prohibited this method from being used.

Therefore, up until 1890, we find there was no complete classification made of the national origins of the parents of the American population by the Census Bureau. This is an admission of Doctor Hill in the hearings conducted by your committee. It seems to me, therefore, that the record as well as the law rules out the "rate of increase as shown by successive decennial United States censuses."

DANGERS OF GOING ASTRAY

There remains, then, "such other data as may be found to be reliable." What that data is and how reliable it may be is for the committee to determine. In passing upon the reliability of whatever remaining data there may be I am sure it is not necessary to warn the committee against going astray on testimony presented by people whose mental complex seems biased by international and racial prejudices and inhibitions always latent to some extent in the human breast. The law does not provide that the committee shall consult the opinions and prejudices of our various racial or national groups. The law specifically provides that the commission of Cabinet officers shall search the records for facts. The law does not provide the commission shall search emotions for prejudices. It is plain that the same provisions of law apply to the committee. The Congress of the United States legislates under the provisions of the Constitution. It is not within the province of Congress to legislate for or against any person or group representing any nationality composing its citizenship. We legislate as Americans. The Constitution does not distinguish between racial groups.

I find on reading the report of the committee of experts that they have arbitrarily divided the American population into two classes. The native American stock and the immigrant stock. The native American stock is held by the committee of experts to be composed of those whose ancestors were here before 1790, and that part of our population whose ancestors came here after 1790 are designated as immigrants and the children of immigrants. This arbitrary classification is the foundation of the report of the committee. I would like to know how this committee of "experts" discovered that the population of the United States prior to 1790 were not immigrants or children of immigrants. That is a new theory that I nominate to stand on a par with Doctor Einstein's fourth and fifth dimensions, interesting for speculative purposes, but surely not to be relied on to form the foundation of an American immigration policy. I know of no provision of law nor do I desire any such that may prohibit those whose ancestors were here before 1790 from purchasing for themselves championship belts for the purpose of designating to the world that they are the only "simon pure" Americans. But for purposes of legislation we can not distinguish or give any preferred status to any particular group.

The law specifically confers the duties of finding the facts upon a commission of three Cabinet officers. This commission has made its report. It is evident that the report of the Cabinet officers based upon the work of their "experts" satisfy the committee that the data is not of such a character that it was sufficient to comply with the provisions of section (c) of the immigration act. I therefore assume that the present hearings have been extended by the committee to other sources in the hope that it may find "such other data as may be found to be reliable." How scientific and how reliable such testimony may have been as presented to the committee by the various witnesses appearing before it is for the committee to determine. It must be evident and apparent to the committee that the sources enumerated in the law have been searched and found wanting.

It is therefore plain that the committee having discarded the report of the commission appointed by law, and if the national-origins clause is to be put into effect and used as a basis for our immigration policy it can only be done by amending the immigration act of 1924. If that is the intention of the committee, I assume its recommendations will be based upon information obtained in public hearings, and will be political in character, since the scientific and statistical data to which we are limited under the law is not found to be reliable.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 284 of the Judicial Code be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 284. No grand jury shall be summoned to attend any district court unless the judge thereof, in his own discretion or upon a notification by the district attorney that such jury will be needed, orders a venire to issue therefor. If the United States attorney for any district which has a city or borough containing at least 300,000 inhabitants shall certify in writing to the district judge or the senior district judge of the district that the exigencies of the public service require it, the judge may, in his discretion, also order a venire to issue for a second grand jury. And said court may in term order a grand jury to be summoned at such time, and to serve such time as it may direct, whenever, in its judgment, it may be proper to do so. And such judge may, upon request of the district attorney or of the grand jury or on his own motion, by order authorize any grand jury to continue to sit during the term succeeding the term at which such request is made, solely to continue business unfinished by such grand jury: Provided, however, That no grand jury shall be permitted to sit in all during more than three terms. But nothing herein shall operate to extend beyond the time permitted by law the imprisonment before indictment found of a person accused of a crime or offense, or the time during which a person so accused may be held under recognizance before indictment found."

Mr. JONES. I have no objection, Mr. President.

CONDEMNATION OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (H. R. 13461) to provide for the acquisition of land in the District of Columbia for the use of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 5, to strike out all of section 6, and to insert in lieu thereof a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. The court shall also direct service of a copy of said order of citation before the return date of the said order upon each of the persons named therein who is, so far as ascertainable by reasonable inquiry, residing or sojourning at the time within the District of Columbia. The court shall also require a copy of said order of citation to be mailed, postpaid, to such of the persons named therein as may be shown by said petition or affidavit to be nonresidents of the District of Columbia, such copy to be addressed to such persons at their last-known places of residence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 11, after the word "of" where it first occurs, to strike out "an amount equal to the assessed value of the land to be taken" and insert "the amount of the estimated compensation stated in said declaration," so as to read:

Upon the filing of said declaration of taking and of the deposit in the registry of the court to the use of the persons entitled thereto of the amount of the estimated compensation stated in said declaration, title to the said lands in fee simple absolute, or such less estate or interest therein as is specified in said declaration, shall vest in the United States of America, and said lands shall be deemed to be condemned and taken for the use of the United States, and the right to just compensation for the same shall vest in the persons entitled thereto; and said compensation shall be ascertained and awarded in said proceeding and established by judgment therein, and the said judgment shall include, as part of the just compensation awarded, interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on the amount finally awarded as the value of the property as of the date of taking, from said date to the date of payment; but interest shall not be allowed on so much thereof as shall have been paid into the registry. Be it enacted, etc., That the seventh paragraph of section 9 of the Federal reserve act, as amended (sec. 326, title 12, U. S. C.), is further amended by striking out the last sentence thereof and inserting the following:

"The expenses of all examinations, other than those made by State authorities, may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be assessed against the banks examined and, when so assessed, shall be paid by the banks examined. Copies of the reports of such examinations may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be furnished to the State authorities having supervision of such banks, to officers, directors, or receivers of such banks, and to any other proper persons."

SEC. 2. That section 5240, United States Revised Statutes, as amended by section 21 of the Federal reserve act, is further amended in the third paragraph thereof (sec. 483, title 12, U. S. C.) by striking out the second sentence of such paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The expense of such examinations may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be assessed against the banks examined, and, when so assessed, shall be paid by the banks examined."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES IN FEDERAL COURTS

The bill (S. 5229) to amend section 876 of the Revised Statutes was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, what is the change that is proposed in the Revised Statutes? That is all I desire to know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think I can state that. The bill simply authorizes subpœnas to be issued for witnesses in any part of the United States, except that if the subpœna goes more than 100 miles an order of the court must be had.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana wish now to offer the amendment which he has offered, and which is printed and lying on the table?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the period after the word "Columbia" and to add thereto the following:

Provided, however, That in the taxation or assessment of costs, witness fees for witnesses subpœnaed as provided by this section shall not be taxed or assessed in an amount greater than fees now provided by law for mileage, per diem, and sustenance, and not in excess of the actual number of miles necessarily traveled and the actual number of days necessarily in attendance within the State in which the trial is held.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether the subpœna would run beyond the limits of the State?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; it would run anywhere in the United States if the court so ordered. Application must be made to the court. The purpose is actually to bring the witnesses in where they can be interrogated before the court, rather than to take their depositions at a distance; but the order must be procured, and no costs can be taxed against the defendant that are incurred without the State.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, does this mean that a witness can be subpœnaed clear across the country?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. From one end of the United States to the other?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. And his attendance compelled?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. KING. In a civil suit?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In a civil suit. The necessity is so obviously apparent in the cases arising out of the oil leases. Depositions in cases of that kind would be of no consequence at all, or, at least, would not meet the necessity of the case; and whether or not the subpœna shall be issued is a matter that is always addressed to the discretion of the court.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am very loath to object to the consideration of any measure; but that seems to me to be so drastic, and such a sweeping change in the existing situation, that I should like to have time to study the bill. I think I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES

The bill (S. 5193) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of the State of Pennsylvania was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I think we had better let all these bills go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will all be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 9021) providing for the punishment of persons escaping from Federal penal or correctional institutions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MISUSE OF OFFICIAL BADGES

The bill (S. 2213) providing against misuse of official badges for United States marshals and their deputies was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "Attorney General" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "head of any department of the Government of the United States"; on line 8, after the word "by," to strike out the words "United States marshals or their deputies, special agents of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, Federal probation officers, or officials or employees of Federal penal or correctional institutions" and to insert in lieu thereof "any subordinate thereof"; and on page 2, line 4, to strike out the words "the Attorney General may prescribe" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "may be prescribed by the head of the department of which such badge indicates the wearer is an officer or subordinate," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the wearing, manufacture, or sale of a badge or badges of the design or designs prescribed by the head of any department of the Government of the United States for use by any subordinate thereof, or of any colorable imitation thereof, or the possession of any such badge or badges, or colorable imitation thereof, with intent to sell or wear the same, is prohibited, except when and as authorized under such regulations as may be prescribed by the head of the department of which such badge indicates the wearer is an officer or subordinate.

SEC. 3. Any person who offends against the provisions of this act shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $250 or by imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing against misuse of official badges."

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, KENTUCKY

The bill (S. 5337) to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I move that that bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

BUILDING REGULATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 5360) to regulate the height, exterior design, and construction of private and semipublic buildings in certain areas of the National Capital was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, from my understanding of this I am in favor of the bill; but the Senator from Maryland, as I understand, has objected to it, and would like to be heard on it. In his absence, I feel like asking the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] to let the bill go over. I do not ask that for myself, because I am for the bill, as I understand the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

JOE D. DONISI

The bill (H. R. 924) for the relief of Joe D. Donisi was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Joe D. Donisi, the sum of $100 a month for 50 months, from and after the date of the approval of this act, as compensation for disability resulting from injuries sustained by him on August 27, 1922, while a student, citizens' military training camp, Camp Knox, Ky. Such monthly payments shall be made through the Employees' Compensation Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SPECIAL DISBURSING AGENTS, ALASKA RAILROAD

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 135) for the relief of special disbursing agents of the Alaska Railroad was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

marines, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FEDERAL PRISON CAMPS

The bill (H. R. 11285) to establish Federal prison camps was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, this is a House bill, and it came before the Judiciary Committee, a subcommittee was appointed consisting of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], and myself. Representative CRAMTON, of Michigan, appeared before the committee, and we went into the matter very thoroughly.

It is well known that the Federal prisons are badly crowded. Really, there is not enough room to take care of the prisoners in a proper way. So it has been suggested by the Department of Justice that some measure of relief might be given by providing, under certain restrictions and limitations, that prison camps might be established on public domain and that the prisoners taken there caused to take part in the work that is to be done of a public nature. There is no idea of bringing these prisoners in contact with the general public, and it seems that all the safeguards relative to that situation have been suggested and provided for in this bill. The House bill was amended only in one particular.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am very much in sympathy with the theory of this bill, if I understand the bill, but I have in mind the fact that there are only a few Federal prisons, a large number of prisoners are imprisoned, and if we establish Federal prison camps they might have to take the prisoners to some State other than the one in which they are confined, the cost would be enormous, and the experience we have had in some places where the prisoners were "farmed out," if I may use that expression, has not been entirely satisfactory. I was wondering if all those matters had been brought to the attention of the committee, and if they had considered them.

Mr. STEPHENS. Those matters were considered. Of course the old system of leasing convicts is not carried out in this measure. These camps will be, I imagine, of a temporary nature, because when work is concluded in a particular section, then it will be necessary, of course, either to carry the prisoners back to the penitentiary or take them to some other place to work. The transportation of prisoners will mean some expense, but they will be paying expenses by performing these services.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator allow me to ask one more question?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Has not a commission been authorized recently to make a thorough investigation into the Federal prisons, and to make recommendations for such changes and modifications as are necessary in existing law? If so, it would seem to me that we might pretermit legislation upon this matter until their report comes in. But I do not want to intrude my judgment against that of the committee which has investigated the matter if they considered all those questions.

Mr. STEPHENS. We went into these matters pretty thoroughly, and the questions were discussed rather carefully before the House committee.

The Senate Committee on the Judiciary was willing to accept the bill as it passed the House, provided it was amended in one small particular, and that amendment is found in the first page.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, not having had an opportunity to read the bill and hearing only a part of what he said, whether the present inmates of the prisons are to be employed by private contractors or by the States or counties on public works?

Mr. STEPHENS. No. The idea is this, that the Attorney General will be authorized to establish, equip, and maintain prison camps upon sites selected by the Attorney General, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of the Interior, and on written order of the Attorney General convicts may be conveyed to those camps, where they will be employed upon works the cost of which is borne exclusively by the Federal Government. That means, of course, that they can not be employed upon public roads where the States pay part of the cost, and can not be employed upon Indian reservations.

Mr. JONES. Suppose a private contractor has a contract for the building of a public building. Could he employ or use these convicts?

Mr. STEPHENS. No, Senator.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. STEPHENS. They are not to be controlled or handled in the slightest by private contractors.

Mr. KING. One other question, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FEDERAL CONSTRUCTION CO. (INC.)

The bill (S. 4817) for the relief of the Federal Construction Co. (Inc.) was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow to Federal Construction Co. (Inc.) the sum of $2,800, in full settlement for the construction of a concrete drainage trench in connection with contract of July 6, 1925, for the construction of a drainage system at United States Veterans' Bureau Hospital No. 97, Chillicothe, Ohio. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,800 for payment of the claim.

LAWTON, OKLA., FIRE RELIEF

The bill (H. R. 4084) for the relief of the persons suffering loss on account of the Lawton, Okla., fire, 1917, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Let that go over.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to occupy a moment or two in explanation of this bill. The bill pertains to some 25 citizens of my home city in Oklahoma. The measure has been passed twice by the House of Representatives; it came to the Senate two years ago too late to receive consideration; it came back at this session; and after thorough consideration the junior Senator from Colorado made an adverse report. Upon my request the Committee on Claims gave me permission to come before the committee, which I accepted, and after consuming the better part of a forenoon the bill was reported out over the objection of the Senator from Colorado.

The bill proposes to pay some 25 citizens the total sum of about $75,000 because of fire loss during the war. The city of Lawton is adjacent to the Fort Sill Military Reservation. Fort Sill gets its water from the Lawton city water supply. The lake that furnishes water to those two institutions comes from the mountains some 15 miles away from Lawton. The lake is some 200 feet above the city and the water runs by gravity across the reservation to the city of Lawton. When the war came on in 1917 the pipe line supplying the city and fort was not large enough to supply both institutions, because with the influx of soldiers at Fort Sill and Camp Doniphan, something like 50,000 or 60,000 soldiers, the pipe line was too small, being only 16 inches in diameter. So the city of Lawton, at the request of the War Department, gave Fort Sill the entire water supply, or the capacity of the pipe line.

An arrangement was made with Camp Doniphan and Fort Sill that they should have the entire water supply—the full capacity of the pipe line—in the daytime from 4 o'clock in the morning until 11 o'clock at night. From 11 o'clock at night until 4 o'clock in the morning the city of Lawton could open up the valves and the people could fill their buckets, bathtubs, and barrels to tide them over the next day. In order to protect the city of Lawton and its property from fire an arrangement was made that, in case of fire, the entire pipe-line capacity should be turned down to the city of Lawton. The man in charge of Camp Doniphan, Major General Wright, entered into an understanding by letter with the city authorities that, in case of fire, the valves should be opened and the entire capacity of the pipe line should be turned to the city to fight the fire.

One day in September, I have forgotten the exact date, fire broke out in the city. The city is practically a new town, established in 1901, and in 1917 was only 16 years old, a western country town, the buildings mostly of one-story construction, some two stories, mostly frame. So when the fire broke out of course great damage was done.

Under the agreement with the authorities at Fort Sill in a case of that kind, the authorities telephoned to Camp Doniphan and asked them to close the valves leading to Fort Sill and to turn the entire capacity of the water down to Lawton. The city authorities telephoned Fort Sill when the fire broke out, but the person they got on the other end of the line at Fort Sill told them to call some place else. They telephoned some place else and were again advised to telephone still another place. After 45 minutes of ceaseless efforts to get the water turned on and failing, the city of Lawton was forced to send a man on a motor cycle to Camp Doniphan and get the valve opened. The valve was close to Fort Sill. It was finally opened and in a few minutes the fire was put out, but during the 45 minutes two blocks of the city were destroyed. Those two blocks were covered with frame buildings.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4084) for the relief of the persons suffering loss on account of the Lawton, Okla., fire, 1917, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims, without amendment, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $75,000 to the persons whose names appear below, as compensation in full for loss of property destroyed by the fire on September 24, 1917, in the city of Lawton, Okla., such loss having been the result of the inability of the fire department of the city of Lawton to control said fire because of lack of water, all available water for fire-fighting purposes having been appropriated and being used by the War Department in connection with the training of soldiers at Fort Sill and Camp Doniphan: Date Crabtree, $1,132; H. D. Ingraham, $33,682.57; Anna Beaver, $1,800; W. Garven, $1,000; Mrs. C. E. Bear, $7,750; Joe Jacobson, $3,000; Dr. L. C. Knee, $3,000; S. J. Coffey, $1,413.18; C. J. Aurell, $406.75; J. G. Mitchell, $3,077.88; John H. Ledgerwood, $200; E. L. Shanklin and E. L. Kelley, $1,550; Julia N. Burns, $1,208; Hannah Beaver, $700; Mary E. Wooten, $3,150; Charles Fuson and J. E. Fuson, $3,850; Ada Hammond and O. W. Northrup, $2,419.72; Annabel Young, $1,775.35; Lee N. Wallis, $1,000; Mrs. E. C. Swisher, $959; D. D. Dean, $317; C. R. Simpson, $2,850.15: Provided, That before any of said claims are allowed and paid the Comptroller General of the United States shall make an investigation of each of said claims to determine the extent and amount of such loss and damage, and such claims shall be adjusted in amounts not in excess of the amounts set out herein and upon certificates issued to each said claimant by the said Comptroller General of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL PRISON CAMPS

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has kindly consented to withdraw his objection to calendar No. 1607, the bill (H. R. 11285) to establish Federal prison camps. I ask that we may recur to that number.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, to strike out the words "or any other public improvement for which Congress provides appropriations" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the cost of which is borne exclusively by the United States: Provided, That this act shall not authorize any such camp for employment upon any Indian reservation," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General is hereby authorized to establish, equip, maintain, and operate prison camps upon sites selected by the Attorney General, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of the Interior. Upon written order of the Attorney General persons convicted under the laws of the United States may be transferred to such prison camps for employment upon road or trail building, the cost of which is borne exclusively by the United States: Provided, That this Act shall not authorize any such camp for employment upon any Indian reservation.

SEC. 2. That the act of Congress approved June 21, 1902, as amended by the act of April 27, 1906, providing for commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners, shall be applicable to prisoners transferred to the camps herein authorized; and in addition thereto each prisoner, without regard to length of sentence, shall be allowed, under the same terms and conditions as provided in the acts of Congress above referred to, a deduction from his sentence of five days for each month of actual employment in said camp.

SEC. 3. That all laws of the United States relating to the imprisonment, transfer, control, discipline, escape, release of, or in any way affecting prisoners, except as modified by this act, shall be applicable to prisoners transferred to the camps herein authorized.

SEC. 4. That as part of the expense of operating such prison camps the Attorney General is hereby authorized and empowered to provide for the payment to the inmates or dependents upon inmates of prison camps herein authorized such pecuniary earnings as he may deem proper, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

SEC. 5. That the expense incident to the establishment, equipment, maintenance, and operation of prison camps shall be payable from the appropriation for support of United States prisoners, and such appropriation shall be reimbursed to the extent agreed upon by the Attorney General and the head of the department to which the appropriation for road building or such other public improvement incident to which the prison camp was established was made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

GENERAL SUPPLY COMMITTEE

The bill (H. R. 5769) to authorize the consolidation and coordination of Government purchases, to enlarge the functions of the General Supply Committee, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. TYSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President, may I ask who it was that objected?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] objected.

Mr. GOFF. I wish the Senator from Tennessee would withdraw his objection. This is a very important measure. It has the unanimous approval of the Judiciary Committee. It involves a saving of $500,000 to the Government in purchasing supplies which are needed by it in every executive department of the Government. It provides for a reimbursable fund and provides for a warehouse that will permit the storage of all the purchases of the United States Government for its needs. It also eliminates entirely any expense that may in any way be connected with trucking and carrying materials from the railroad stations to the different executive departments. It has met with the unqualified approval of the Comptroller General, the Secretary of the Treasury, the General Supply Committee, and the Committees on the District of Columbia. It has also in its present form fully met the approval of the committee of the House.

Inasmuch as it is very important to get the bill through and have it go back to the House for consideration and approval there, as amended, I would ask the Senator, in view of the statement that I know what I am now saying is within the knowledge of many other Senators upon the floor to whose attention the matter has been invited, to withdraw his opposition.

Mr. TYSON. I can not withdraw my opposition for the time being. I shall be glad to talk with the Senator about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. TYSON subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to withdraw my objection to Calendar 1672, House bill 5769.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate will recur to the consideration of Calendar 1672.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5769) to authorize the consolidation and coordination of Government purchases, to enlarge the functions of the General Supply Committee, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, through the General Supply Committee established under the provisions of section 4 of the act approved June 17, 1910, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes," is hereby authorized and directed to purchase or procure and distribute supplies to meet the consolidated requirements of the executive departments and independent establishments of the Federal Government in Washington, D. C., and of the municipal government of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the requirements of the field services of any department or establishment, when request is made by the head thereof, shall be included in such purchase or procurement and distribution of supplies. SEC. 2. That each executive department and independent establishment shall furnish from time to time, when called on to do so, estimates of its requirements for inclusion in purchases which it is proposed to have made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and there shall be reserved from proper appropriations sufficient amounts in each case to reimburse the general supply fund hereinafter created. The General Supply Committee shall charge the proportionate cost of supplies, including breakage, shrinkage, transportation, cost of handling by the Treasury Department, and inspection, and bill the same to each requisitioning department; and each requisitioning department and independent establishment shall reimburse said general supply fund out of its appropriation upon proper vouchers.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby authorized to be set aside as a special fund in the Treasury Department, to be known as the general supply fund, such sum as may be appropriated by Congress for the making of payments for supplies to be purchased under the provisions of this act, including the cost thereof and transportation charges, and reimbursement therefor upon presentation of proper vouchers, shall be made by each requisitioning office, out of any appropriations which may be applicable, by depositing the proper amounts directly to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States for the credit of the general supply fund herein authorized, and duplicate certificates of deposits issued therefor shall be promptly forwarded to the General Supply Committee: Provided, That all such reimbursements shall be placed to the credit of the general supply fund, and the same are hereby reappropriated for the same purpose as the original fund: Provided further, That there shall be included in each annual report of the Treasury Department a statement of the assets and liabilities of the said general supply fund as of June 30, including as assets any supplies purchased therefrom and on hand, for which reimbursement has not been received: Provided further, That the Comptroller General of the United States shall make an annual audit of the general supply fund as of June 30, and there shall be covered into the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus found therein, all assets and liabilities considered, above the amount appropriated to establish the said fund: Provided, however, That payments for supplies procured for a field service may, in the discretion of the head of the department or establishment controlling such field service, and with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, be made direct to the vendors by the department or establishment.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe suitable regulations to give full force and effect to the purposes of sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act.

SEC. 5. That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, such sites and additions to sites, in the vicinity of United States Reservations 17B, 17C, 17D, or 113, as may be necessary, and is authorized and directed to construct, on the sites so acquired or on other land in said District belonging to the United States not needed for other purposes, the location to be subject to the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, a building or buildings of fireproof warehouse type, with approximately 400,000 square feet of floor space, to provide storage space and facilities and the necessary offices connected therewith, for use of the General Supply Committee of the Treasury Department, of other departments or independent establishments of the United States Government, and of the municipal government of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 6. That the control of assignment of space in said building or buildings shall be vested in the Public Buildings Commission, established by section 10 of the act approved March 1, 1919. Compensation for such occupancy, space, and facilities as are utilized by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall be on a rental basis on terms to be fixed by a board consisting of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

SEC. 7. That the plans for such building or buildings shall be prepared by the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital in consultation with the Commission of Fine Arts; and he shall be charged with the custody, protection, maintenance, repair, and operation of said building or buildings.

SEC. 8. Authority is hereby given for closing and vacating such portions of streets as lie between such sites and such alleys as intersect such sites, and the portions of such streets and alleys so closed and vacated shall thereupon become parts of such site.

SEC. 9. Not more than $10,000 of any funds hereafter appropriated for the purposes of this act may be expended by the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks for obtaining, by contract or otherwise, such special technical personal services as may be necessary, at rates of pay as may be fixed by the director not exceeding those usual for similar services, without reference to civil-service rules and the classification act of 1923.

GABRIEL ROTH

The bill (S. 1688) for the relief of Gabriel Roth was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$25,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$7,564.15"; in line 8, to strike out "confiscation" and insert in lieu thereof the word "loss"; in line 9, before the word

"arrested," to strike out the word "falsely," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Gabriel Roth the sum of $7,564.15, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as compensation for and in full satisfaction of all of his claims against the United States on account of injuries sustained and the loss of his property when he was arrested and imprisoned by officers employed by and acting under authority of the Department of Justice, said arrest having occurred at Jacksonville, Fla., on or about January 21, 1918.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have the Senator from Mississippi give me some explanation of the bill. The reason I ask that is because a number of persons have spoken to me and said that the bill does not have merit and that if it were passed it would be a great reflection upon officers of the Government. I have not had time to examine into it, but several persons have spoken to me in opposition to it. I should be glad to have the Senator in a few moments explain the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, this is a bill which received very careful consideration. The man Roth was arrested during the war period. In all my experience I have never known a case where any individual was worse treated than he. He was not a German, but he was charged with being one. The real reason for the charge being made against him was because at the time he was operating a restaurant next door to a saloon. The former owner of the restaurant had been assisting the saloon keeper in violating the law by selling liquor for him after hours. Mr. Roth refused to do that after he purchased the restaurant, and the saloon keeper reported that he was a German spy.

As I have said, he was arrested. He was shamefully treated by the men who placed him under arrest. He was abused and vilified, and the name of his mother was brought into the matter. His personal property was taken from him, some of it of considerable value. He was never able to recover that property. He was not permitted to get in touch with a certain society which was being conferred with by the Government from time to time, in order that he might establish the fact that he was not a German citizen.

Further, Mr. Roth had papers of great value. It had cost him a large sum of money to procure those papers. The bill was introduced and referred to the Claims Committee of the Senate. The clerk of that committee testified before the subcommittee having the bill in charge as to the theft of the papers. I shall not go into all those details, because it might reflect on some persons whose names I do not care to draw into the discussion. Those papers belonging to him were stolen out of the committee room. They have never been found.

Congressman Mason, former Senator Mason, interested himself in the case and thought under all the circumstances that the man ought to have the sum of $50,000. Later, however, when the bill was introduced it provided for $25,000. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and I, sitting as a subcommittee, considered the matter quite carefully, heard all the evidence, and literally spent days considering the matter, because our sympathies were somewhat aroused, and yet we did not want our sympathies to lead us away from the right. So we were quite careful, and we proposed an amendment to the bill reducing the amount from $25,000 to $7,564.15.

Mr. KING. What became of the personal property which was taken from him and what was its value?

Mr. STEPHENS. It disappeared. The officers who arrested Mr. Roth, or one of those officers, I should say, was a man of very bad character. They disappeared. We of the committee were never able to get in touch with those men, even through the Department of Justice. This statement of the facts about the matter did not come alone from Mr. Roth, but from disinterested parties. In addition to that, there was much evidence that he had been in contact with many of our citizens of the highest type, certain organizations of splendid people, and that he had always borne a splendid reputation.

Mr. KING. I am trying to ascertain, if the Senator will pardon me, just what his losses were, and, secondly, what obligation the Government has. Who were the officers that arrested him and why should he not proceed against them?

Mr. STEPHENS. That would be useless because they have no property. Even if he recovered judgment, he could not collect anything on the judgment. The Senator will observe that the amount was reduced to $7,564.15 and the report shows that the amount is made up of several items. One thing was a Liberty bond which was taken from him by the officers. Certainly jewelry was taken from him. He was kept in jail for quite a while. Now, he has become a physical wreck, and almost, I might say, it seems to me, a mental wreck because of the worry that he has had on account of the treatment he received. The matter was discussed before the subcommittee composed of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and myself, and the committee felt that the man should be repaid at least this sum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACK subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to state with reference to the Roth bill just passed that I am a member of the Committee on Claims. I voted in the Committee on Claims against the recommendation of the committee. I did not want to place my judgment against that of the entire committee, so I did not object to the consideration of the bill at this time. I objected to it in the committee on the ground that the Government should not pay anything in the way of damages for false imprisonment or malicious prosecution, and I did not want it to appear here that I had established a precedent for myself by voting for such a proposition.

ported for military duty, but whose induction or commission into the service was not, through no fault of their own, formally completed on or prior to November 11, 1918, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That upon application made by or on behalf of an individual, whether living or deceased, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to carry upon the records of the War Department as though he had been duly inducted into the service of the United States and subsequently duly discharged therefrom, any registrant under the selective service law and regulations who applied for voluntary induction into the service and was accepted, and who, pursuant to competent orders, reported for active duty as a soldier, but whose induction into the service, through no fault of his own, was not formally completed on or prior to November 30, 1918; and the name of any such shall, under this act and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, be so carried upon the records of the War Department; and any such person shall be deemed to have been a soldier and shall be regarded as such from and after the date on which, pursuant to competent orders, he reported for active duty as a soldier, to such extent as to entitle him to receive a certificate evidencing his discharge from the service as of the date of the termination of such service.

SEC. 2. That no person shall be entitled to receive any bonus, compensation, gratuity, pay, allowances, or privileges by virtue of any provision of this act which are not conferred upon individuals discharged from draft.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution to provide for appropriate military records for persons who, pursuant to orders, reported for military duty, but whose induction into the service was not, through no fault of their own, formally completed on or prior to November 30, 1918."

HOSPITAL AT MARION BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME

The bill (H. R. 14153) to authorize an additional appropriation of $150,000 for construction of a hospital annex at Marion Branch was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. I should like to have an explanation as to necessity for that bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the bill provides an appropriation for the building of a hospital which was authorized by previous legislation. When the Government came to construct the building it was deemed unwise to erect the character of building which could be constructed with the first appropriation of $100,000; it was not considered that it would be economically sound to do that. So, in order to provide for an ample and sufficient building, the additional appropriation is asked for beyond the authorization. I think it is all right, and the committee were unanimously of that opinion.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TESTS OF PROTEIN IN WHEAT

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The period provided in the unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration of bills on the calendar having expired, the Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had hoped that we would reach on this call of the calendar Order of Business 1795, being Senate bill 5632, a bill of such importance and urgency that it was my purpose to ask unanimous consent for its consideration this afternoon. It provides for the establishment by the Government in cooperation with the States of protein-testing laboratories. It has the enthusiastic approval of the Department of Agriculture and the unanimous approval of the committee. I think there is no objection to it. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5632) to provide for producers and others the benefit of official tests to determine protein in wheat for use in merchandising the same to the best advantage, and for acquiring and disseminating information relative to protein in wheat, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known as the "Federal-State protein testing act"; and the word "Secretary," as used herein, means the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary is hereby authorized to establish, maintain, and operate protein-testing laboratories at such places as he may deem advisable and practicable for the official protein testing of wheat and the certification thereof and for and in connection with the other purposes specified herein. The Secretary is also authorized to have tests made in any such laboratory on the protein content of wheat of any year prior to or during the harvesting and marketing thereof, and he may compile and disseminate estimates based on such tests on the probable amount of protein in the wheat in any given area; and the Secretary is further authorized to collect and disseminate information for the benefit of all concerned pertaining to protein in wheat as a merchandising factor and relative to the conditions affecting the quality and quantity of protein in wheat and surrounding the marketing of wheat with respect to protein.

SEC. 3. That cooperative protein-testing laboratories shall be established, maintained, and operated whenever deemed practicable in cooperation with any State agricultural college meeting conditions prescribed by the Secretary or in lieu thereof with any other agency of a State with which cooperation is found practicable and desirable.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary is authorized to charge and collect fees fixed by him for any laboratory from persons requesting the performance of services under this act. In case a protein-testing laboratory is operated cooperatively, the Secretary shall prescribe the basis on which any fees charged and collected hereunder shall be divided upon payment between the cooperating parties. All money accruing to the Secretary as aforesaid shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The Secretary is further authorized from time to time to make such regulations as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act, and he may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, District, or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or any person; and shall have the power to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees not in conflict with existing law, and make such expenditures for rent outside the District of Columbia, printing, telegrams, telephones, books, publications, furniture, stationery, office equipment, travel, and other supplies and expenses as shall be necessary to the administration of this act in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $285,000 for expenditure during the fiscal years 1929 and 1930 for carrying out the purposes of this act, and the appropriation of such additional sums as may be necessary thereafter for carrying out the purposes of this act is hereby authorized.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF OLD POST-OFFICE PROPERTY AT BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. There is on the calendar, being Order of Business 1761, a House bill to provide for the sale of the old post-office property at Birmingham, Ala. The terms of the sale and the time of sale are left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill has been favorably reported by the Senate committee, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14466) to provide for the sale of the old post-office property at Birmingham, Ala., which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to sell the Government property situated in the city of Birmingham, Jefferson County, Ala., known as the old post-office property and described as being all of lots 11, 12, 13, 14, and west 20 feet of lot 15, in block 87, according to the Elyton Land Co.'s survey of property in Birmingham, Ala., and more particularly as beginning at the northeasterly intersection of Second Avenue and Eighteenth Street, running thence with the line of Second Avenue 170 feet, thence in a northwardly direction 140 feet to an alley, thence with the line of said alley 170 feet to Eighteenth Street, thence with the line of Eighteenth Street 140 feet to beginning. Said property to be sold, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, at such time and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, and to convey such property to the purchasers thereof by the usual quitclaim deed. The proceeds of said sale shall be paid into the general fund of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRED ELIAS HORTON

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 9597) for the relief of Fred Elias Horton and I submit a report (No. 1854) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to know what it is about.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, Commander Horton served in the auxiliary service of the Navy, before the war, for 11 years and 6 months. He commanded colliers and naval auxiliary vessels. When the World War came on the officers serving in the naval auxiliary service were put in the Naval Reserve Force. He served during the war and for about six years in the Naval Reserve Force. He was recommended for bravery and a decoration was given to him by the Secretary of the Navy. In 1921 he could have appeared before a retiring board on account of the condition of his eyes, which was very bad, but the department needed his services, and he continued to serve until 1925, having a service of 17 years. All this bill does is to permit him to appear before a naval retiring board in order to determine whether the blindness from which he is suffering and which is now nearly complete was contracted in the service of the Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this character of legislation is very bad, in my opinion. It will be the basis of additional applications for relief, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SWANSON. There are two or three similar bills which have passed. This man is now nearly blind. All he asks is the privilege, which he had at one time, of appearing before a naval retiring board, to ascertain whether the condition of his eyes is due to his service for the Government. I do not think there will be any objection to the bill.

Mr. KING. The Naval Affairs Committee, in my humble opinion, succeeded in securing the passage of a general bill that was ample, and, indeed, too broad, and now they are reporting constantly measures which violate the rules which they should observe.

Mr. SWANSON. This case was different. The bill to which the Senator refers was where the service was rendered in the reserve. This officer served for 11 years and 6 months in the Navy before the war. All he asks is the privilege of going before a regular naval board to ascertain whether the condition of his eyes is due to his naval service. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. KING. I will not object, but I say to the Senator that such measures as this are very unfair to the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to order Fred Elias Horton, formerly commander, United States Naval Reserve Force, to appear before a naval retiring board for the purpose of determining whether or not the disability complained of in his case originated in the line of duty in time of war: Provided, That if said naval retiring board finds that the said Fred Elias Horton is now suffering from a disability incurred in the line of duty in time of war which renders him unfit to perform all duties of the grade of commander, United States Naval Reserve Force, in time of war, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Fred Elias Horton a commander, United States Naval Reserve Force, and to place him upon the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay and emoluments of that grade: Provided further, That no back pay, allowances, or emoluments shall become due because of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETIREMENT OF CERTAIN WORLD WAR OFFICERS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might reach on the calendar this afternoon Order of Business No. 1724, being the bill (S. 4708) to amend the act of May 24, 1928, entitled "An act making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the world War." Inasmuch as it has not been reached, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I must insist upon the understanding.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow evening, at not later than 8 o'clock, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, beginning where we left off this afternoon; and if the consideration of unobjected bills shall be concluded before 11 o'clock that the remainder of the time until that hour be devoted to the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair make an inquiry? Does the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Kansas contemplate a continuous session of the Senate to-morrow?

Mr. CURTIS. No; when the naval appropriation bill shall have been disposed of to-morrow afternoon I contemplated that the Senate would take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ought that not be included in the agreement?

Mr. CURTIS. I did not put that in, because I did not know at what time we would complete the consideration of the naval bill, and I thought it might be possible, after the disposition of that bill, to take up for consideration some other measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair suggest to the Senator that he present his unanimous-consent request in the usual form of such agreements providing for evening sessions, that at not later than 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock, and so forth?

Mr. KING. I shall feel constrained to object. I will have no objection to-morrow morning, as soon as we meet, to having the Senator from Kansas propose such an agreement, because then there will be Senators here who are now absent.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 22, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, February 21, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

From morning's dawn to evening's shade, Thou art our guardian angel, Heavenly Father. So remain with us that there shall be no room for the memory of any wrong. The heart of love is the sweetness of existence. O for a world of strife shut out and a world of brotherhood shut in. Blessed God, persuade the strongest, the weakest, and the humblest that we forgive just in the degree that we love. May we this day renew our covenant, and may it be said to our country that truth is between us forever. Be Thou the anchor of our best thoughts, the guide on our pathway, and the very soul of our mortal beings. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANTS

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the joint congressional committee appointed to investigate the Northern Pacific Railroad land grants, and under authority of joint resolution of May 28, 1928, I present a privileged report from that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah presents a privileged report from the joint committee under authority of joint resolution of May 28, 1928, and the same will be referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the committee on memorials some two or three weeks ago I asked that all Members of the House be granted 10 legislative days within which to extend their remarks upon the life, character, and public services of our late colleagues memorialized in the ceremonies of yesterday. I suggest to the Members who will extend their remarks that they leave them with the official reporters, with the understanding that all the remarks touching any one of our late colleagues be assembled and printed in one issue of the RECORD. I think all will see the wisdom of this course.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How long a time did the gentleman say we have within which to extend our remarks?

Mr. FRENCH. Ten legislative days. Consent for that has already been granted. Members have inquired touching the form that will be used in the heading. May I say that a form has been worked out which the reporters have and which will be a common form used in all extensions of remarks of this character.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. And that will be inserted by the reporters?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. And no further request need be made?

Mr. FRENCH. No.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Is that 10 days from yesterday?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, as a newspaper editor, may I suggest that all of these be printed in one issue, not only with reference to one of our deceased colleagues but with reference to all of them.

Mr. FRENCH. I think that would be a desirable procedure to follow.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

REGULATING THE PRACTICE OF THE HEALING ART IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (S. 3936) to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia, and move its adoption.

The Clerk reported the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3936) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3936) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia," submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the conference report, namely:

On amendment No. 1: By this amendment the House corrected an obvious oversight in the drafting of the bill. Section 2 of the bill, prior to adoption of the House amendment No. 1, provided that "No person shall practice the healing art in the District of Columbia who is not (a) licensed so to do, or (b) if exempted from licensure under section 42 of this act, then duly registered."

In addition to the classes exempted from licensure by section 42, certain other practitioners are exempted under section 43, which was not mentioned in section 2 of the bill as passed by the Senate. This oversight was corrected by the House amendment, which the Senate conferees have accepted.

On amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5: By these amendments (several of which involve only relettering of separate phrases) the House provided that the commission on licensure shall, in addition to appointing boards of examiners in medicine and osteopathy, basic sciences, and chiropractic, appoint also a board of examiners in naturopothy. This assures equal recognition to practitioners of naturopothy under the same restrictions and limitations applying to other methods of healing. By action of the conferees the Senate recedes from its disagreement to this action of the House and agree to the same.

On amendment No. 6: By this amendment the House provided that the provisions of the act requiring examination, educational qualifications, licensure, etc., should not apply to persons treating human ailments by what is known as "clystertory treatments" involving the use of liquids applied by mechanical means to the internal organs of the body.

So far as is known, there are only one or two such practitioners in the District of Columbia; and no known or recognized schools for the teaching of such methods of treatment. It was felt by the conferees on the part of the Senate that to leave in the bill such a broad exemption might in the future make this particular section a refuge for many unprincipled persons seeking to prey upon the sick. It is felt that neither harm nor injustice will be done by substituting in lieu of the House amendment a provision that practitioners of clystertory treatment within the District of Columbia on January 1, 1928, may continue to so operate under the provisions of this act. The Senate, therefore, recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 6 and agree to the same with the substitution outlined above, to which the House conferees have agreed.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10374) for the acquisition of lands for an addition to the Beal nursery at East Tawas, Mich., submit the following written statement, explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report.

The Senate amendment to the House bill, H. R. 10374, struck out everything after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof inserted the following:

"That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend, from the appropriation for planting trees on national forests during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and/or from the appropriation for cooperation with States during the same fiscal year under the provisions of section 4 of the act of June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 653), as amended, such amounts, but not to exceed a total of $25,000, as may be necessary to acquire by purchase or condemnation lands or water rights necessary, in his judgment, for forest-tree nurseries or for additions to existing forest-tree nurseries, and any lands obtained under the authority of this act shall, upon acquisition, become parts of the nearest national forests."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act authorizing the acquisition of land and water rights for forest-tree nurseries."

The House bill provided that an amount not to exceed $2,500 be used to acquire certain lands as an addition to the Beal nursery in East Tawas, Mich. The Senate amendment provided that an amount not to exceed a total of $25,000 be used for the acquisition of land and water rights for forest-tree nurseries. The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment to strike out the amount of $25,000 and insert in lieu thereof $20,000.

THE COLUMBIA RIVER BASIN BILL AND A NEW RECLAMATION POLICY

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the so-called Columbia Basin bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the reclamation policy pursued in the past, while it has brought great fertility to limited areas of the West, is far too limited in its application to meet conditions as they now exist. We have developed areas far from the great centers of population and remote from the natural markets of the country.

We now need a broader policy that will commence with the reclaiming of the worn-out lands of New England and the East, lands that can be made to produce the staple crops in abundance, lands that are near to the centers of population and the markets of the country.

We of the East have poured out our money by the hundreds of millions to develop the West, with the result that our agriculture is at a low ebb. We have taken the lifeblood out of the industry, sent it elsewhere to develop other sections, and put their agricultural products and their farms into competition with our own. Now, we are coming to you and asking you to give heed to our needs and help us to bring back to productivity our worn-out soils.

This is a broad policy of reclamation that should command the support of the entire Nation. Until that is done I feel constrained to oppose the limited policy that we have been following. I have no specific objection to this bill, but I commend a broader policy that will bring back to the great storehouse of the Nation during the years of the past at least a measure of agricultural prosperity.

This is not a new idea. It has been proposed by a Secretary of the Interior and commended to our attention. Until his advice is heeded, let us halt such legislation as is comprehended in the pending bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman wants time, I am willing to reserve my objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. This is on a subject which is now engaging the attention of the Federal Reserve Board and financial circles all over the United States.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have nothing against the Manufacturers Record, but I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

COUNTRY RETREAT FOR PRESIDENTS

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement by the President of the United States concerning the proposed summer White House, as well as a brief description of the property selected.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of President Coolidge that it would be advisable to provide for the Chief Executive of the Nation a place close to Washington where the President might go for two or three days, thus affording a complete change of atmosphere, which would be beneficial to the health of the occupant of the White House, will be before the Congress for action in the form of a small appropriation, $48,000, when the last deficiency bill is under consideration.

The necessity for such a retreat is presented by President Coolidge in a signed article published in the fiftieth anniversary number of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, December 9, 1928. In concluding the article the President suggested to Mr. Joseph Pulitzer, owner of the paper, that the press could bring about the establishment of a home in the hills for the President if it would take it up and pursue it with vigor. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch has acted upon this suggestion, and following its lead the papers of the country have commended the idea editorially.

The article written by President Coolidge follows:

A SUGGESTION CONCERNING THE PRESIDENCY

By Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Superior, Wis., August 10, 1928.

Mr. JOSEPH PULITZER,
Editor, the Post-Dispatch,
St. Louis, Mo.

MY DEAR Mr. PULITZER: Your message advising me that the Post-Dispatch is planning on celebrating its fiftieth anniversary with a special edition containing contributions from various people, and requesting me to send you an article dealing with some phase of the presidential office, has been received. A half century is an exceedingly respectable age for a newspaper in our country. That period has seen the development of the community which you serve from a thriving town to a great metropolis, in which your publication has taken an important part. Your distinguished father, Joseph Pulitzer, was for many years one of the leading figures in the journalism of the United States and left his publications strongly marked with the force of his own character when he handed them down to those who are worthily carrying on the various enterprises which he had built up. Those who, like myself, have known him by reputation, and his successors by personal contact, may well join you in celebrating your coming anniversary.

As a President about to retire, I feel at liberty to write of certain phases of that office which one who was entering upon its duties might feel some hesitation in discussing. I shall briefly express my opinion concerning a subject which is often broached, but about which nothing is ever done, although it is recognized by everyone as a matter of the gravest importance. I refer to the health and physical condition of the President, not so much for my own sake as for my successors. I have often remarked that at least I had one distinction. I have been the healthiest President that the country has ever had.

My ability to keep well has not been due to a particularly robust constitution or any extraordinary efforts in physical exercise. My habits have been regular. It is seldom that I have been late at meal time and I have avoided keeping late hours. Very little work has been done before breakfast, but usually I have taken a short walk, and during the winter season a more extended walk before dinner, which has been my chief mode of exercise. I have kept a couple of vibrating machines in my room, which I have found helpful. It will be seen that in the matter of exercise my efforts have been toward a conservation of time. Such activities have been adopted as could be put into operation at once without the necessity of a change of clothing or travel to some other location before exercise could begin.

At the time I took office there was considerable discussion of what could be done to remove all unnecessary burdens from the President. Some legislation was proposed. I did not look upon that with much sympathy, perhaps because unconsciously I may have felt it would be a declaration of weakness, but certainly because my experience in public office made me know that whether I was to be overburdened with work and broken down in health depended more on myself than any act of Congress. The duties of the Presidency are exceedingly heavy. The responsibilities are overwhelming. But it is my opinion that a man of ordinary strength can carry them if he will confine himself very strictly to a performance of the duties that are imposed upon him by the Constitution and the law. If he permits himself to be engaged in all kinds of outside enterprises, in furnishing entertainment and amusement to great numbers of public gatherings, undertaking to be the source of inspiration for every worthy public movement, for all of which he will be earnestly besought, with the inference that unless he responds civilization will break down and the sole responsibility will be on him, he will last in office about 90 days. There are certain addresses which the President must make, certain appeals to which he may respond, like this one which you have made to me. But in the vast majority of cases he must and should decline.

It is of course obvious that the President should not burden himself with details. Those should be attended to by his departments and his office staff. He should not do any work that he can have done by others. Such energy as he has should be directed not so much toward doing work as making certain that the work is being well done.

There is, however, one thing which the Government could do, which, I think, would be of great physical assistance to the President. Washington is practically at sea level. Its climate is an exceedingly good all-the-year-round climate, but at times the humidity is high and unrelieved it becomes monotonous. The only avenue of escape for the President is the naval boat Mayflower. This is a regular naval craft used for the training of seamen, like any other craft, but it is kept stationed in the navy yard in Washington and is fitted up for the use of the President whenever he may desire to go aboard. The handicap about the Mayflower is that it must necessarily go down the Potomac, which is a change of view and of considerable relief, but affords no change in altitude and very little in climatic conditions.

The movements of the President are a very ponderous operation. Other officers of the Government can travel with a considerable degree of freedom. If they wish to spend a week end at a hotel or a club, they can do so without difficulty. They also have greater liberty in accepting private hospitality. When the President moves it is an event.

A large retinue follows and extensive preparations have to be made in advance for his reception and care. The only place he can enter without considerable preliminary disturbances is the White House.

For these reasons it seems to me that some place should be provided in the hills within easy striking distance of Washington where the President might go for two or three days at a time, when he was so disposed, with conveniences for entertaining members of the Government and other guests, where he could have that freedom of action which he has only at the White House, and where he could get a complete change of atmosphere.

While I have made no mention of the mistress of the White House, she is of course to be considered. The public little understands the very exacting duties that she must perform and the restrictive life that she must lead. Fully as much as the President, she needs an opportunity for a change and some place where she can have the seclusion of the White House without a constant reminder of its obligations.

Three or four years ago some thoughtful-minded person left a legacy of $200,000, which I should judge would have been ample to provide a place of this kind within 60 or 75 miles of Washington. It had a proviso that it should be accepted by the Congress. I did not give the matter any thought at the time and the Congress never paid any attention to it. Had it been accepted, a country house would now be available.

Such a residence would not be in a strict sense a summer White House, but if such a place had been provided I should not have desired to leave Washington so early in the season or return so late. Being distant from the Capital for a considerable length of time each summer is attended with a good many inconveniences, even when we have the use of the airplane for mail purposes and a special wire running into the White House. It is desirable for the President to stay for some time in different sections of the country, but a month or six weeks at the most is ample for him to make such observations and acquaintances as are required for him to understand something of the problems of various localities.

It is not too much to hope that the press of the United States can bring about this desired result. I am certain that if you would take it up and pursue it with the vigor which always marks the advocacy of any cause in which you believe, you could undoubtedly prove an important factor. If this could be done, future Presidents and future mistresses of the White House would have a great deal for which to thank you, and you would have the satisfaction of knowing that the celebration of your fiftieth anniversary has been an opportunity for a real service to our country.

Very truly yours,

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

Mr. Speaker, President Coolidge has recommended to the Congress an appropriation of $48,000 to be used for alterations and repairs to the buildings now located at Mount Weather, Va., overlooking the Shenandoah Valley. This property, formerly used by the Weather Bureau for weather experiments, abandoned for that purpose, belongs to the Government. It is about 60 miles from Washington and 30 miles from the proposed Shenandoah National Park. The land cost the Government years ago $2,513.15 and the buildings constructed thereon an additional $181,527.70, making a total investment of $184,040.85.

As Lieutenant Colonel Grant, 3d, Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks says, it is the most economical way of carrying out President Coolidge's suggestion.

Mr. Raymond P. Brandt, a member of the staff of the Washington bureau of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, visited Mount Weather and wrote an interesting article concerning the place. I include his article, published in the Post-Dispatch Sunday, February 10, 1929, as part of my remarks. The article follows:

A VISIT TO MOUNT WEATHER, COOLIDGE'S SUGGESTION AS RETREAT FOR PRESIDENTS

By Raymond P. Brandt, a staff correspondent of the Post-Dispatch

WASHINGTON, February 9.—Atop Mount Weather, of the Blue Ridge chain, just 61 miles into Virginia from Washington, the Government owns 84 acres of land which President Coolidge thinks could be made into an ideal country retreat for future Presidents—a refuge where our Chief Executives could find occasional relief from the low altitude, the heat, and the formality of the Capital.

The writer inspected the site and was surprised to find that it was easily accessible to Washington and that the buildings were almost ready for occupancy. President Coolidge has told friends that $30,000 would be ample to make the place into a modest but comfortable country home, an extension, as it were, of the White House. The buildings were formerly used by the Department of Agriculture Bureau.

When President Coolidge, in the fiftieth anniversary number of the Post-Dispatch, first advanced the idea of a rural retreat for future Presidents, he stated that the place should be within easy motoring distance of Washington and should give a distinct change of elevation, Washington being only slightly above sea level.

NOT THREE HOURS FROM WHITE HOUSE

Mount Weather meets the two conditions. It has an elevation of 1,800 feet and in summer can be reached in two hours through some of Virginia's most interesting scenery. Traveling in a light automobile, the writer made the trip from the White House in two and a half hours. He was delayed by 5 miles of icy mountain road that called for low gear all the way. Should the Mount Weather site be chosen for a presidential retreat it is safe to assume that the State of Virginia would be glad to build an all-weather concrete road from the village of Bluemont to the top of the mountain where the Government buildings stand. With the exception of this stretch, the road from Washington is good. In fact, part of it is the best in Virginia.

The 84-acre tract and its buildings were used for many years by the Department of Agriculture Weather Bureau as a field laboratory. It was abandoned, however, in 1915, when the bureau decided to concentrate much of its experimental work in Washington.

The principal structure on the tract is a large, square, three-story yellow brick administration building, with 16 bedrooms and 7 baths. This building, set on the very peak of the mountains, faces to the east, and overlooks the Loudoun or Goose Creek Valley. At its back, to the west is the beautiful Shenandoah Valley, the pride of Virginia, with the Shenandoah River plainly visible as it meanders through the fertile farm land. The grounds have been landscaped just enough to afford good views of the two valleys. This building has a large veranda from which there is a splendid view of the eastern valley. The Shenandoah Valley is best seen from the cupola that once housed the meteorological instruments.

James Fowler, the caretaker of the place, said that on a clear day a person could see 22 miles to the hills in the east and "as far as the eyes will go" to the west. The view from the cupola compensated for the 2½-hour ride.

BUILDINGS ON THE SITE

A hundred yards to the right of the main building is another structure about the same size but made of native stone. It was used by the weather experts as a laboratory. A hundred yards from it is a large frame house which was used by the superintendent and his family as a home. Like the other buildings, it has been abandoned, yet it shows few signs of deterioration.

Hidden in the trees to the right of the old administration building and laboratory is a heat and power plant, which furnished steam heat and electricity to the other buildings.

Back of these buildings is a structure which the writer took for a huge hay barn. He was astonished to learn that it was a balloon house. Fowler said that the weather experts had used a 30-foot captive balloon to gather data on the upper air currents. Near this barn-like structure are two gas tanks.

Fowler, who owns a farm adjoining the Government tract, became as enthusiastic as a real-estate salesman when he described the many advantages of Mount Weather as a presidential retreat.

"There are plenty of turkeys, quail, pheasants, rabbits, and squirrels in the woods around here," he said. "If the President wanted to fish, he could go down to the Shenandoah or Goose Creek and hook catfish, perch, and, perhaps, some mountain trout."

ARRANGEMENT OF MAIN HOUSE

Taking the writer through the main building, Fowler showed how it could be made fit for the President, his family, and his guests. He pointed out that the main hall was furnished in real fumed oak. The two large rooms to the right and left of the hall were identical in size and each had a large brick fireplace. Back of these were two other large rooms. Fowler thought that the two rooms on the left side of the house could be used as a sitting room and a study, and the back room on the right side as a dining room.

As it stands now, the dining room could seat 20 persons. Fowler pointed out that if a larger room was wanted, the wall between the front and back room could be knocked out. This would give room for 30 or 40 persons.

All the rooms have high ceilings. Back of the old dining room is a large butler's pantry, and behind that, one enormous kitchen with a large range. The second floor is reached by a fair-sized stairway—also of fumed oak, as Fowler pointed out. On this floor and the third were the bedrooms. Walls could be easily knocked out if larger rooms were desired. The third floor opens on the roof of the veranda. This roof commands a magnificent view of Goose Creek Valley.

POPULAR FOR COUNTRY HOMES

Mount Weather has long been a popular location for country homes, Fowler said. He named with pride some of the city men who had country estates on this mountain. Among them were Admiral Leigh-Palmer, formerly president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation; Peter Drury, a Washington business man; and F. L. Sandoz, a wealthy Washington real-estate dealer. The men have large and imposing homes, half hidden from the road by the trees, but overlooking the valleys. The estates run from 10 to 1,000 acres.

The caretaker was much impressed by the fact that Frank G. Carpenter, the world traveler and writer, had had a large country estate on the mountain.

"You know, Carpenter traveled all over the world, yet when he settled down he selected this mountain," Fowler said. "He called his place 'Journey's End.' Rather appropriate for a fellow who had traveled so much, wasn't it? His daughter is living on the place now."

Fowler seemed somewhat distressed over the slight signs of deterioration in the buildings. As a matter of fact, however, these signs seemed extremely slight when one remembered that the buildings have not been used for more than 13 years. The walls were never papered or painted, and naturally some of the plaster has fallen down. There were also some large cracks in the cement floor of the veranda. On the whole, however, the buildings are in fairly good shape, and President's estimate of $30,000 for putting the place into shape seemed liberal. The two main buildings originally cost about $40,000 each and were solidly built.

OVER HISTORIC GROUND

No description of Mount Weather would be complete without a few words about the road leading to it from Washington. It includes part of the famous Lee Highway and the Lee and Jefferson Memorial Highway and it runs through the interesting and historical villages of Falls Church, Fairfax County courthouse, Leesburg, Purcellville, Round Hill, and Bluemont.

Leaving Washington by way of the Francis Scott Key Memorial Bridge, the motorist goes through the Virginia suburbs of Washington. Then comes Falls Church, the first real village where one finds southern homes with high-columned verandas. Here the motorists strike a concrete section of the Lee Highway, which takes him to Fairfax County courthouse, where George Washington's will is on display. This is one of the best roads in Virginia.

At Leesburg the motorist sees a real southern town. To a middle westerner the homes are enormous. They are the old ante-bellum homes, built when a man counted his wealth in acres and slaves. Purcellville is much like Leesburg, only smaller. Hamilton and Round Hill are of the same type, yet distinctive.

At every turn, however, the motorist is struck with the evident prosperity of the countryside. Sleek Holstein and Jersey cattle mark this section as one of the most prosperous dairying regions in the East. If any other proof were needed, the skeptical need only look at the huge, well-kept barns and towering silos.

From Leesburg on, the Blue Ridge Mountains form the western horizon. These mountains might have been misnamed as to height, for they are not very high; but they were certainly not misnamed as to color. They are blue, particularly at sunset.

If Mount Weather is finally selected as a presidential retreat, the automobile trip will be an integral part of the recreational benefits.

MOUNT RUSHMORE NATIONAL MEMORIAL COMMISSION

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate bill (S. 3848) creating the Mount Rushmore National Memorial Commission and defining its purposes and powers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the conference report on Senate bill 3848. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read.

The conference report and statement is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3848) creating the Mount Rushmore National Memorial Commission and defining its purposes and powers having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 2, line 3, insert in lieu of the matter stricken out by the House amendment the following: "Provided, That the secretary may be paid such salary for his services as may be determined by the commission. The commission is also authorized to pay such actual and necessary expenses as the secretary may incur in the performance of his duties. Such salary and expenses shall be paid by the treasurer of the commission upon the order of the secretary thereof and then only when approved and countersigned by the chairman of the executive committee"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 3, line 5, strike out all of the last sentence of the said House amendment; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3848) creating the Mount Rushmore National Memorial Commission and defining its purposes and powers, submit the following written statement, explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report.

House amendment No. 1 struck out the proviso relating to the payment of the salary and expenses of the secretary of the commission and the method of approval of expense accounts. It is quite important that the commission should have the services of a secretary, and the language substituted provides for payment of salary as may be determined by the commission and reimbursement for actual and necessary expenses in the performance of his duties, as well as the manner of approval of accounts covering such expenses.

That part of House amendment No. 2 providing that no charge shall ever be made for admission to the memorial grounds or for viewing the memorial is retained. That part relating to the necessity for legislative action on the part of the State of South Dakota in the matter of providing for maintenance of the memorial is stricken out, the nature of the memorial being such that there can be no maintenance cost for many centuries.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

ROBT. G. SIMMONS,
WM. P. HOLADAY,
ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the conferees may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman to make a statement as to the extent of the change made in the conference report.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the gentleman from New York pleases, it is the change I suggested to him ought to be made.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I know; but I think the House should be informed.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senate carried in the District appropriation bill an item of $150,000 for a tubercular hospital for children. After conference with the District officials and others, it was determined that a study of that matter ought to be made and we wrote into the conference report a proviso of $1,500 for this study and directed that a report be made to the first session of the coming Congress. The money will not be available unless made available immediately until July 1. I have withdrawn the report and inserted the proviso that that $1,500 be immediately available, and with that exception there is no change in the report.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I suggest that a further reading of the report is unnecessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Clerk will read the statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

During the reading of the statement the following occurred:

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GRIFFIN. To make the suggestion to my colleague from Nebraska, that all of this statement was published in the RECORD of February 19, on pages 3805 to 3807. In view of the fact that there has been no amendment made other than that which was presented by the gentleman a few moments ago I suggest that a motion be made to dispense with the further reading of the statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the statement be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the statement be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he has taken care of the balance of Sixteenth Street, about which we spoke last year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is all taken care of?

Mr. SIMMONS. In the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 36.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 36: Page 39 of the printed bill, insert in line 5 the following language: "Provided, That the Board of Education is hereby authorized, under appropriations hereafter to be made, to expand the two existing normal schools into teachers' colleges, and at the end of the fourth year thereof to award appropriate degrees."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO MAKE THE UNITED STATES A PARTY DEFENDANT IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 13981 to permit the United States to be made a party defendant in certain cases, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked. The Senate has stricken out all after the enacting clause and inserted an entirely new bill, and I have been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask the House to dissent to the Senate amendment, agree to the conference asked by the Senate, and have conferees appointed. The Senate has already appointed conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 13981, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill and Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

During the reading of the Senate amendment the following occurred:

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with, as we are only going to formally disagree to the amendment and send the bill to conference.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to find out if the Committee on the Judiciary, by unanimous vote, recommended the action which is now taking place?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; this morning.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. GRAHAM, DYER, and SUMNERS of Texas.

NANCY HART

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7452) for the erection of a tablet or marker to be placed at some suitable point at Alfords Bridge, in the county of Hart, State of Georgia, on the national highway between the States of Georgia and South Carolina, to commemorate the memory of Nancy Hart, with a Senate amendment, and if this request is granted I shall move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to act as Speaker pro tempore tomorrow.

LOAD LINES FOR AMERICAN VESSELS

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 1781) to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1781, with Mr. CRAMTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. At our last session section 1 had been read, but the committee amendments had not been reported. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that general debate has been completed and we are now reading the bill under the 5-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is exhausted and the first section of the bill has been read, but the committee amendment has not yet been reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

First committee amendment: Page 1, line 5, strike out "Subsec." and insert "Sec."; same line, strike out "Cargo carrying" and insert "Merchant."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition on the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire, if possible, to get the attention of the committee to point out the necessity of speedy enactment of this bill and the abundance of data, information, and statistics on this very interesting subject to be found in the legislative records of other countries, particularly England.

The opposition to this bill seems to be localized to meet particular conditions in various localities of the coast. Yet if the attitude of the House to-day is contrasted with what took place in the British Parliament in 1875 and 1876 it will show that great progress has been made to an impressive degree. Still there is this striking similarity, that the very same exemptions sought in the early days of the legislation in England are written into this bill to-day.

No one can think of load line without pausing a moment to pay tribute to the pioneer in this work, Samuel Plimsoll, of the British Parliament. He was a lone crusader for nearly 20 years in bringing about the reform which resulted in the enactment of the first load-line law in England. For 20 years this man fought in the British Parliament. He was considered a nuisance, as some reformers and progressives are in this country, and at one time had no less than 20 suits for libel pending against him. In one instance the judge was so impressed with the truth contained in the statement which was the basis for the libel suit that he departed from the old English maxim, "The greater the truth, the greater the libel," and dismissed the complaint on the ground that the plaintiff had not come into court with "clean hands." That indeed, was startling in an action at law.

Prior to the first enactment of the shipping act of 1875, conditions in England due to the complete freedom of shipowners to load their vessels without any restriction or supervision were almost beyond description. It was Samuel Plimsoll who compelled the passage of the first act to make a continuance of these shameless enterprises impossible. Here is a brief extract from the Lifeboat Journal of November 1, 1870—a British publication—which perhaps tells the entire story and which described the conditions which Mr. Plimsoll was seeking to correct:

> We have repeatedly through the medium of this journal strongly called attention to the terribly rotten state of many of the ships above 20 years old; in too many instances on such vessels getting ashore their crews perish before there is any possibility of getting out the lifeboat from the shore to their help. * * * Such is the notoriously ill-found and unseaworthy manner in which these vessels are sent on their voyage that in every gale, even if it be one of moderate character only, it becomes a certainty that numbers of them will be destroyed, as will be seen from the fact that 844 of them were lost in 1864, 934 in 1865, 1,150 in 1866, 1,345 in 1867, 1,014 in 1868, or 6,357 in six years. It is overwhelming to contemplate the loss of life from these, in too many instances, preventable wrecks.

Even the Government recognized this terrible condition, for in the report of the Board of Trade for 1868 we find this startling statement:

> If this number is subdivided, it will be found that about half of it is represented by unseaworthy, overladen, or ill-found vessels of the collier class, chiefly employed in the coasting trade. For the six years ending 1868 the number is more than half.

Notwithstanding these terrible conditions, the impressive annual statistics of dead British seamen, Mr. Plimsoll's effort to pass a temporary bill would have been balked in 1875 had he not created a scene in the House of Commons and so outraged some of the staid and dignified proprieties of that august body as to attract universal attention to the resistance of the shipowners and crystallize public opinion in favor of the enactment of the first load-line bill.

Alexander H. Japp, an English author, in a short biographical sketch of Samuel Plimsoll, published by T. Fisher Unwin, London, puts in one paragraph that may well be applied to the consideration of this bill to-day and what, to my mind, fits almost every movement for welfare legislation and for laws to protect the lives of the workers, to prevent exploitation, and to make life safer and cheerful:

> One of the oldest arguments directed against Mr. Plimsoll in his benevolent crusade was that such measures, if passed, would "destroy responsibility." Responsibility, indeed. The responsibility of a man employing labor is only legitimately exercised when he takes all precautions to protect the lives of those employed by him. The liberty to do what one likes with one's own may be accepted in its widest latitude as regards goods and chattels, though even here the law has come in with many wise restrictions; but, though a man hires the labor of another, he does not make himself master of his life, and he is assuredly responsible to society if in any way which is preventible he endangers it.

The controversy against the enactment of the law compelling ships to undergo inspection and fix a specific load line was so strong that, as I have just stated, even the usual calm and dignity of the British House of Commons was upset on many occasions.

In England, and I believe the law applied to the United Kingdom, the first statutory obligation to mark a load line on the sides of a vessel was contained in the merchant shipping act, 1875. This act was the outcome of the agitation against the alleged unseaworthiness of ships, with which agitation the name of the late Mr. Samuel Plimsoll was so closely associated, and the circular disk with a horizonal line drawn through its center, which is the statutory mark, has ever since been commonly referred to as the "Plimsoll mark."

This act was to remain in force but one year, and under it the compulsory marking of a load line applied only to foreign-going vessels. Gentlemen will note that way back in 1875 in England they were seeking some of the same exceptions and exemptions contained in the bill before us. That is, exempt coastwise vessels and certain kind of lumber schooners, and we here add an exemption to ships on the Great Lakes. If we study the history of this legislation in England, it will readily be seen how foolish it would be to repeat the mistakes of the past and make these exemptions. In 1876 the British Parliament passed a further act which required the owners to place the statutory mark upon every British ship except those under 80 tons register employed solely in the coasting trade, ships employed solely in fishing, and pleasure yachts. This mark was to indicate the maximum load line in salt water to which the owner intended to load the ship for the voyage upon which she was about to proceed.

I find that the act of 1876 which provided and compelled a statutory load line, its position on the sides of a vessel was determined by the owner and it was permissible for him to alter the position at the commencement of any voyage from a port in the United Kingdom. It will readily be seen that such a law was not satisfactory to the sponsors of the load-line legislation, which accounts for the agitation being kept up in England for many years after the enactment of the first laws in 1875 and 1876. I will state right here that this provision was found to be unsatisfactory. For that reason, when the bill now before us is read for amendment, I shall seek to strike from the bill that provision which would permit a shipowner from recommending or selecting the agency authorized to inspect and mark the ship. In the light of experience it would be a fatal mistake to permit that provision to remain in the bill.

The provisions of the English law respecting compulsory marking of the load line remained in operation without alteration until the year 1890, in which year the law was amended, and the power to detain overladen ships was conferred on the British Board of Trade. Having constituted the power to detain ships, the Board of Trade then found it necessary to prepare tables of freeboard for the guidance of their surveyors. It would seem that at this time the marking of the ship was taken from the shipowners themselves, and all control taken from the shipowners and vested in the Board of Trade. Between 1873 and 1890 the question of load line was very much alive in England. The first tables of freeboard were published in 1882, and in 1883 Lloyd's Register of Shipping also issued tables of freeboard based upon principles which were afterwards adopted by the first load-line committee, which was appointed by the Board of Trade in December, 1883.

In 1885 the load-line committee reported that it was necessary to frame general rules concerning freeboard which would prevent overloading without unduly interfering with trade, and submitted tables of freeboard giving the maximum loading which could be permitted with safety in cargo-carrying vessels. Due to the tremendous agitation and irresistible public opinion, these tables were adopted by the Board of Trade on the voluntary application of shipowners. Thereafter the Board of Trade assigned load lines to vessels in accordance with these tables. The application of the tables and the compulsory marking were definitely written into the English law in 1890 by the merchant shipping load line act. By the same act the Board of Trade was empowered to employ Lloyd's Register of Shipping and any other corporation or association for the survey and register of shipping approved by the Board of Trade. The language of the bill now before us follows in this respect almost verbatim the provisions of the English act of 1890. The provisions of the English law with respect to compulsory marking of the load line have remained in operation to the present time and are now embodied in the English merchant shipping act of 1894. An extension of the provisions was made in the merchant shipping act of 1906, which provided that the exemption of ships under 80 tons' register employed solely in the coasting trade from compulsory marking of a load line should cease so far as it respected cargo-carrying steamships.

Now, gentlemen, why should we to-day in the year 1929 exempt free-lumber schooners or vessels operating on the Great Lakes or vessels operating to and from territory contiguous to the United States? Even the act of 1894 was found to be too loose and permitting of too many exceptions, and a committee was appointed in England in March, 1898, to consider a proposed modification of the limits laid down in the tables of freeboard for the operation of the winter North Atlantic freeboard. Immediately after the appointment of the committee the members reported to the Board of Trade that there were other questions requiring consideration, notably an extension of the tables of freeboard to larger vessels than those already provided for and the formulation of rules for dealing with so-called turret-decked vessels. This committee reported in November, 1898, and the so-called winter North Atlantic freeboard was modified in accordance with their recommendation, which also included tables of freeboard in regard to large vessels and turret-decked vessels.

In 1903 the German authorities adopted tables of freeboard which caused the British rules to again be reviewed while studying the new German rules. The Board of Trade revised the tables of freeboard, the new tables going into effect on the 1st of March, 1906.

In the general debate reference was made to lumber-carrying schooners. I understand that some of my colleagues from both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts will make every effort to exempt lumber-carrying schooners. In this instance, too, it is not necessary to experiment, for we have the experience of England and other countries which have enacted load line laws and which were confronted with the same claim from owners of ships specializing in the transportation of lumber. Permit me to quote from the report of the committee of the British Board of Trade of 1926:

SPECIAL LOAD LINE FOR TIMBER-LADEN VESSELS

We have given careful consideration to the question of a special load line for timber-laden vessels which would permit them to be loaded more deeply than vessels loaded with other cargoes. We find that the load-line rules adopted by the Governments of the Netherlands, Norway, and Russia make special provision for such a load line and that there is a body of opinion in some other foreign countries to the effect that timber-laden vessels, under certain conditions, can be immersed with safety more deeply than vessels with other cargoes.

We have examined the specific conditions contained in the load-line rules of the Netherlands, Norway, and Russia, under which the deeper immersion of timber-laden vessels is permitted. While we are unable to fully agree in detail with those conditions or with their application, we recognize that in certain cases where vessels are specially constructed or specially fitted for the carriage of wood goods, both in the holds and on the deck, it might be contended from some points of view that timber-laden vessels could be loaded more deeply than vessels laden with other cargoes, provided it could be guaranteed that the special conditions required were fulfilled. In the great majority of cases, however, the carriage of deck cargoes of wood goods increases the risk to the vessel and to the crew; and even in the special cases referred to we consider that it is quite impracticable to insure by administrative or other action that the special conditions are complied with.

In these circumstances we are of opinion that it is not desirable to make any provision in the rules for the assignment of a special timber load line.

It would seem to me, in the light of past experience, we should not exempt lumber schooners, whether they are sailing to contiguous foreign territory or not. That is another reason why I shall oppose the committee amendment contained in section 9 of the bill.

In the discussion in general debate questions were asked as to the loss of lives and ships of American registry, and no one seemed to have any figures in regard to it.

If the committee will give me its attention, I will start with 1924. In 1924 we lost on the Atlantic coast 96 vessels, which were a total loss. We lost in tonnage 45,664 tons, 65 lives, and a total property loss of $5,215,000.

Mr. BACON. Was that all due to overloading?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That brings us to the point. I am going to put in the figures. In England prior to the enactment of the first load line law the loss was over 50 per cent greater than after its enactment. Since then there has been a gradual decrease in losses, both in lives and ships, due, of course, to improved ships, radio, and better construction.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Was the legislation in England passed in 1878?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In 1875 the first act was passed by Parliament.

If my colleagues will permit, I want to give you these figures and statistics of the dead for the past five years before yielding to other questions. In the year 1924, as I was stating, we lost on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts 96 vessels and 65 men. On the Pacific coast, 47 vessels and 29 men. On the Great Lakes, 15 vessels and 16 men. At sea and in foreign waters we lost no less than 28 vessels and 79 men. The property loss along the coast was $9,000,000, and at sea it was $6,549,931 in the year 1924. During the year 1925 we lost on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts no less than 100 vessels and 73 persons; on the Pacific coast, 57 vessels and 20 persons; on the Great Lakes, 15 vessels and 39 persons. I want to remark right here that the vessels on the Great Lakes were by no means small individual sailboats or small motor boats. The 15 vessels lost had on board passengers and crew 3,230 persons whose lives were endangered. During the same year, 1925, we lost 34 vessels at sea and in foreign waters and 43 men. The property loss along the coast during this year was $11,000,000, and the property loss in foreign waters was $3,680,878. In 1926 we lost on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts 122 vessels and 141 men; on the Pacific coast 41 vessels and only 4 men lost their lives; on the Great Lakes 18 vessels were totally lost and 17 men. The value of the property lost along the coasts during that year was $13,000,000. In that year the loss at sea and in foreign waters was 24 vessels totally lost and 66 men. This is quite a decrease from previous years, owing in a measure to the fact that according to the statistics there were less American ships employed in foreign waters than in the previous years. The total property loss of American ships in foreign waters was valued at $4,000,000. In 1927 we lost on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts 114 vessels and 104 men; on the Pacific coast, 61 vessels and 21 men; on the Great Lakes, 20 vessels and 5 men. Again I want to stress the fact that the vessels on the Great Lakes were of average large tonnage, as the reports of the Coast Guard Service indicate that the lives of 4,213 people on these 20 ships were endangered.

The total property loss along the coast for that year was $13,000,000. In 1927 the loss of American ships in foreign waters was 37 ships and 68 men; property loss of $6,979,733. In 1928, 119 vessels were totally lost, taking with them 59 lives, along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts; along the Pacific coast, 51 ships and 14 men; the Great Lakes, 18 ships were lost and 31 men. The property loss along the coasts in this year was $11,000,000. During the same year we lost 31 ships at sea and in foreign waters and 51 lives, representing a property loss of $5,852,967.

These figures were taken from the annual reports of the United States Coast Guard. It is proper at this point to pause in order to pay a tribute to our splendid Coast Guard Service. It is no exaggeration to say that thousands and thousands of lives were saved through the splendid, efficient, and courageous service of our Coast Guard. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. SHREVE. Can the gentleman tell the House how many ships on the Great Lakes were lost by reason of overloading?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that such arguments were urged as part of the opposition in the British Parliament.

Mr. SHREVE. I do not care anything about the British Parliament. I have lived on the shores of Lake Erie for 30 years, and I know that the losses were not by reason of overloading.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman say that overloading did not contribute to the loss?

Mr. SHREVE. Possibly in one or two cases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman means to say that overloading has nothing to do with the loss?

Mr. SHREVE. Absolutely. The reason why you can not overload a ship on the Great Lakes is because they can not enter a harbor. The harbors will not take an overloaded ship. It is absolutely foolish to talk about it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say that the decrease in total loss of vessels in the British registry was 50 per cent after the passage of the Plimsoll load line. The losses—that is, total losses of ships—in the reports are classified in four subdivisions: Founderings, strandings, collisions, and other causes. For instance, in 1927 on the Great Lakes the total losses were 7 ships foundering, 5 stranded, 1 collision, and 7 attributed to other causes. I am sure that no one can deny that overloading is fatal to any ships in distress. I will add that overloading may in many of these instances be the direct cause of placing a ship in distress.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Has the gentleman any figures to show where any of this loss or what proportion of this loss was caused by overloading?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Has the gentleman similar statistics of other maritime nations?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am referring constantly to the comparison between the losses of British vessels before the load line law and after the load line law. I say to the gentleman from New Jersey that that was the very opposition that was presented against the great fight of Samuel Plimsoll, to whom the whole world owes a debt of gratitude.

Shipowners at that time, when insurances were flourishing, were able to insure their old and unsafe vessels, overload them, send them to sea, and with the limitation of liability in the British law, the same as we have here under the statute enacted in 1851, would have a profit and money for a new ship if the old ship was lost. They cared little for the lives of the crew.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment. Of course, the opposition to this bill is purely local. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] has a certain type of ships in mind. The distinguished gentleman who interrupted me a moment ago [Mr. SHREVE], of Pennsylvania, is interested in the Great Lakes, and in the Great Lake ships, but what we are interested in is human lives. That is the fight that Samuel Plimsoll put up for over 20 years of his life. As I said before, he was hailed into court for libel and there was a demonstration and scene in the House of Commons, the conditions were so bad. In the face of these figures, in the face of the hundreds of lives lost every year, in the face of the hundreds of ships that founder, there is not a man on the floor of this House who can stand up and say that overloading a ship is not a contributing factor to the loss of the ship.

There is nothing new in the load-line idea. You gentlemen can not find a freight car in this country that does not have upon it the limit of loading capacity, and there is no one who would think of putting 5 tons of freight on a 1-ton truck. There is no one who would think of overloading his automobile. But with a ship it is quite different, and why?

This is the reason. If a freight car is overloaded, it collapses and breaks down right on the track. That in itself encumbers the track and delays trains and traffic for days and days. Then the railroad company besides must pay all damages to the freight on that train injured by reason of the overloading. At sea, under our law, taken from the sixteenth century, the liability of the shipowner for loss is limited to the value of his interest in the ship. If the ship is a total loss, he is exempt from all liability. Besides, under our law, if the ship is insured, and they always are, the owner pockets every cent of the insurance and not one penny of it can be reached by the owners of the cargo or by the families of the men who lost their lives with the ship. That is the reason why we have a load line or a load limitation on freight cars and none up to date for ships. That is the reason why it took England 25 years to enact a load line law. And, gentlemen, to be perfectly frank about it, that is the reason why certain types of ships are seeking to be exempt from the provisions of this law. I want to see this law passed to-day without exempting a single solitary ship. It is the limitation of liability, the exemption of liability if the ship is a total loss with the pocketing of the insurance money that encourages overloading. The history of the sea, the records of the shipowners, the statistics of lost ships and drowned seamen, the records of the British Parliament are the unanswerable proof and evidence of this statement.

How can anyone, after the fight of Samuel Plimsoll, after seeing the beneficial effects to the British merchant marine in cutting down loss 50 per cent, stand up in the year 1929 and ask for an exemption in a load line bill?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Has the gentleman any testimony with reference to marine insurance rates, before and after the change in the load line law?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They went down, of course. I do not know the exact figure, but with the wireless, and the load line law, and the improved methods of naval architecture, of course the insurance rates went down; but right there, with the insurance rates coming down, with the limitation of liability, do not you see the resistance of the load line law? If the subject were that of overloading a freight car, you could not argue against the capacity limitation. If it were a truck, you would not argue against the limitation of the capacity. There is not an honest shipowner who would resist this law, and why? Because he loads his ship in safety. Who is resisting it? The shipowners who desire to overload their ships, because insurance to them is more than human life. You can not get away from that argument. No reputable shipowner who does not desire to overload his ships will oppose this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not think that that last statement of the gentleman is quite correct, because some of us are basing our objection because of a peculiar situation with regard to the matter of lumber schooners.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; in respect to lumber schooners.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and with regard to favoritism for certain barges.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am against all exemptions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We support in the main all that the gentleman has said.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, we will all join in opposing any amendment that will exempt any class of ships.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman is in favor of the bill as written by the committee?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not want those exemptions. I am taking the information available 20 or 30 years after this law was enacted and accepted in every large maritime country, and I am opposed to bringing into this bill any provisions excepting any ship that floats on the water flying the American flag. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I want to inquire of the Chair about the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment on page 1, line 5, reported by the Clerk, is actually two amendments. The Chair will take the liberty of separating them. The first amendment is to strike out the word "Subsec." and insert the word "Sec.," and the second is to substitute the word "Merchant" for the words "Cargo carrying." The Chair will take the liberty of calling the attention of the gentleman from Maine to the fact that section 1 actually does not begin in line 5 but on line 3. It is the customary procedure to omit the numbering of the first section. If the committee amendment is adopted, lines 3 and 4 will be orphans.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the criticism of the Chair is sound. I ask unanimous consent that the first amendment be stricken out altogether.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the words "Subsec. 1" be stricken out. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the purpose of the committee amendment on line 5 is to strike out the word "Subsec." and insert the word "Sec."; and strike out "cargo carrying" and insert the word "merchant." The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "a," strike out the word "foreign."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the letter "(b)," strike out the words "cargo carrying" and insert in lieu thereof the word "merchant."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is clearly understood that we permit to remain in line 5 the letter "(a)" and in line 9 the letter "(b)"?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. If there are no further amendments to section 1, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSEC. 2. The Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized and directed in respect of the vessels defined in subsection 1 (a) and (b) of this section to establish by regulations from time to time in general accordance with the practice of the principal maritime nations the load water lines and marks thereof indicating the maximum depth to which such vessels may safely be loaded: Provided, That no load line shall be established or marked on any vessel, which load line, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, is above the actual line of safety. Such regulation shall have the force of law.

With committee amendments as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out "Subsec." and insert in lieu thereof the word "Sec.," and in the same line strike out the words "of this section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, strike out the words "in general accordance with the practice of the principal maritime nations."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, after the word "loaded," insert "and in establishing such load lines due consideration shall be given to, and differentials made for, the various types and character of vessels and the trades in which they are engaged."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk began the reading of section 3.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, will we be able to return to these sections for amendment after we go forward with the committee amendments, or shall we offer amendments now?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments to each section should be offered after the committee amendments are disposed of. Otherwise you can not return.

Mr. DEAL. Otherwise we lose our opportunity?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I think the section has not been finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk began the reading, but did not finish it. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the owner and of the master of every vessel subject to this section and to the regulations established thereunder to cause the load line or lines so established to be permanently and conspicuously marked upon the vessel in such manner as the Secretary of Commerce shall direct, and to keep the same so marked. The Secretary of Commerce shall appoint the American Bureau of Shipping, or such other American corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping as may be selected by him, to determine whether the position and manner of marking on such vessels the load line or lines so established are in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder: Provided, however, That at the request of the shipowner, the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping which the shipowner may select and the Secretary of Commerce approve; or the Secretary of Commerce may appoint for said purpose any officer of the Government, who shall perform such services as may be directed by the Secretary of Commerce. The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, revoke any appointment made pursuant to this action. Such corporation, association, or officer shall, upon approving the position and manner of marking of such load line or lines, issue a certificate, in a form to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, that the same are in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder, and shall deliver a copy thereof to the master of the vessel. It shall be unlawful for any vessel subject to this section and to said regulations to depart from any port or place designated in subsection (1) of this section without bearing such mark or marks, approved and certified by such corporation, association, or officer, and without having on board a copy of said certificate.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Page 2, line 17, strike out "Subsec.," and insert in lieu thereof the word "Sec."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 21, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows.

Page 3, line 23, strike out "subsection (1) of this section" and insert in lieu thereof "section (1)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ABERNETHY rose.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, may I offer one suggestion?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "section" in line 18, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 2, line 18, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I listened with a very great deal of interest to the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in favor of this character of legislation. I want to say that if the gentleman knew just the difficulties the committee had to overcome in arriving at this composite bill I do not think he would undertake to change it in any particular whatsoever. If it had not been for the attitude of some of us of the committee who were not in sympathy with this legislation except as it applied to foreign shipping you would not have had an opportunity at this session of Congress to have passed any kind of load-line legislation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I appreciate that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. A number of us thought we should accept the Senate bill as it came from the Senate, the Senate bill dealing only with foreign shipping. There is a very great effort being made now by all the nations of the earth to get together on load-line legislation so as to enable various ships to go into the ports of the various countries without interference. As far as the Senate bill favored load-line legislation there was no objection from a single member of our committee; some of our committee wanted to bring all shipping under the provisions of the bill, others were opposed to this position. When you go into local territories, like those bordering on the Great Lakes, the waters of southern territories, the inland waterways and the Pacific coast, and undertake to put a lot of regulations on a lot of people who have been going to sea for years and years without any regulations it brings on very serious controversies. So we all got together, put our cards on the table, and got behind this bill.

While I was not in favor of anything except foreign ships being included in load-line legislation at this time, in fairness to the members of the committee who favor all vessels being put under load-line legislation, I for one am going to stand back of this bill just like it is written, without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i." When I get into a situation and undertake to enter into a compromise with men like the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], and others I am going to stand by the committee's action. I think the gentleman from New York would forward this legislation if he would undertake to help us to pass this bill as amended rather than to start a fight here to try to cut out these amendments.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I am not going to impose on the patience of the committee, but I just want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I understand his interest in barges operating in his waters; I understand the interest of those who operate ships on the Great Lakes, and I hope these gentlemen will understand my interest in human lives. Our only difference is that one gentleman is interested in barges while I am interested in human lives.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I do not think the gentleman is justified in making that statement. I am interested in human lives as much as he is.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am glad to hear that and I hope the gentleman will help me strike out section 9.

Mr. ABERNETHY. If the gentleman continues his present attitude he will scrap this legislation and he will get no load-line legislation this session. I think we are all in favor of human lives.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am sure the gentleman is, and, therefore, I presume he does not care so much about section 9.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes, I do; I am heartily in favor of section 9.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would like to have the attention of the chairman if I may. My reason for taking the floor was to ask the chairman this question: This work in England is carried on by the British Board of Trade, but the British Board of Trade is an official governmental body while here we delegate this work to the "American Bureau of Shipping" or "such other American corporation." Then on page 3 there is a provision I do not quite understand; it carries this language:

That, at the request of the shipowner, the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping which the shipowner may select and the Secretary of Commerce approve.

Are we to understand that the shipowners are going to select the agency which will conduct the inspection of the ships and the establishment of the safe load lines?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Answering the gentleman's question, the situation is just this: The British Board of Trade has been in existence and operation for almost untold years. It is an organization that reaches into every port of the British Isles and British Dominions. Its representatives are always available to act with respect to these matters, while the American Bureau of Shipping is of comparatively recent birth. It has not expanded as we hope it will expand in the years to come, and it seemed to the committee there might arise a situation where it was necessary to have this survey and there might not be immediately available a representative of the American Bureau of Shipping. So we gave to the Secretary of Commerce the discretion. It is not a right granted to the shipowner, but it is in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce whether in proper circumstances he will permit some one else, or some other agency, to determine the place upon the ship where the load-line mark shall be placed; and that is all there is to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I then move to strike out on page 3, line 5, "at the request of the shipowner," and in line 8 "which the shipowner may select, and the Secretary of Commerce approve," so that the proviso will read:

The Secretary of Commerce may appoint for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping, or the Secretary of Commerce may appoint for said purpose any officer of the Government—

And so on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: On page 3, line 5, after the word "that," strike out "at the request of the shipowner"; and beginning in line 8 strike out "which the shipowner may select and the Secretary of Commerce approve."

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think I have generally stated the situation. There are a thousand ports in the United States stretching from the eastern corner of my State down along the Atlantic seaboard, through the Gulf, and up the entire Pacific coast. I think it is probable in the extreme that in many of these ports at times there will be no representative of the American Bureau of Shipping; there will be no immediate and direct representative of the Department of Commerce. The ship, however, will be there under the necessity of proceeding immediately to sea, or as soon as may be proceeding to sea. I think it is altogether desirable that those upon the ground, knowing the conditions, knowing who is immediately available to perform the duties under this proposed act, may be permitted to request of the Secretary of Commerce that the person on the ground and available may do the work; and then it is lodged in the judgment and the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce whether he will or will not grant the request.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. My objection is not to the request but to the selection.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Maine may be given an additional three minutes in order to answer some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARBER. How often are these vessels to be marked?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The law requires only once.

Mr. GARBER. That is what I inferred. The bill itself fixes no time?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The bill fixes no time, but provides that rules and regulations shall be worked out under the authority of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. GARBER. And the certificate of the Secretary of Commerce, when issued, shall be evidence of compliance.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Shall be evidence of compliance with the law, and the mark on the vessel itself is to some extent an indication of compliance with the law.

Mr. GARBER. Now, efficient administration would require a fixation of responsibility, would it not?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Generally; that is true.

Mr. GARBER. That is the purpose of this bill—to directly fix the responsibility for the loading of these vessels in compliance with the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is true.

Mr. GARBER. Now, under section 3, you authorize the Secretary of Commerce to appoint the Shipping Board, a corporation or an association or a party selected by the shipowner and the Secretary of Commerce, or vice versa, and half a dozen other different individuals, and I am unable to see the necessity for such a variety of appointments to be authorized. The section is so confusing and so scatters the responsibility that I am afraid it will defeat the very purpose of the law which the gentleman now seeks to enact.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If the gentlemen wants me to answer his suggestion, I think the gentleman misapprehends what these provisions actually mean. There is but one authority which may work out the rules and regulations under which load lines shall be placed upon the vessel.

Mr. GARBER. I understand that, and they are the agencies selected by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Not at all.

Mr. GARBER. Or under his rules and regulations.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. These agencies simply make the physical application of the rules that are worked out by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. They do the surveying and they place upon the vessel, or they may see to it that there is placed upon the vessel, in the proper location, a mark in accordance with the rules and regulations worked out by the Secretary of Commerce and by no one else.

Mr. GARBER. That is true; but, under section 3, you delegate power to the Secretary of Commerce to delegate power to half a dozen different agencies.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Only to do this physical thing.

Mr. GARBER. How will the gentleman reconcile that delegation of power to all these various agencies with the requirement in section 2 that "no load line shall be established or marked on any vessel, which load line in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce," and so on? There you make the judgment personal.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. We make the Secretary of Commerce, always, the final arbiter in this entire matter, but we do place at his disposal certain agencies through which he may work out the application of the rules and the regulations. I can see no conflict whatever in the provision.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. Would it not be well to bring out that the American Bureau of Shipping is a Government agency?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It is a Government agency.

Mr. GARBER. The responsible agency for that is the bureau and the delegation of power to be confined to the bureau. The hearings do not disclose any reason why there should be half a dozen different agencies.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Answering the gentleman further, in six or seven years' time we have had three hearings on a bill of this character. Those hearings show that it is essential that there should be some elasticity in this respect, and why we ought not to require that only one agency might do a physical act, because the agency might not be at the spot at the time the vessel was required to clear.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman will yield, let me suggest to the Chairman and to the gentleman from New York, that I think the purpose of both would be met by this amendment: Strike out in line 8, after the word "which," the words "the shipowner may select and "——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would absolutely satisfy me.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Would the gentleman from New York modify his amendment in that respect?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and offer the following:

Page 3, line 8, after the word "which," strike out "the shipowner may select and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 3, line 8, after the word "which," strike out the words "the shipowner may select and."

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the gentleman from New York withdraws his amendment. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEAL was recognized.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I think if the attention of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Maine, was directed to the amendment just adopted he will see that it requires one other word, and that is the word "may" after the words "Secretary of Commerce."

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the gentleman from Alabama is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has been recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I have sent my amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DEAL: Page 2, line 23, strike out line 23 and the succeeding lines on pages 2 and 3, up to and including the word "approved" on line 9, page 3, and in line 10 add the letter "s" to the word "officer," and on page 3, lines 14 and 15, strike out the words "corporation and association" and add the letter "s" to the word "officer."

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee can satisfy me on this point. I do not understand why you wish to distribute among so many organizations the right to establish a load line. Would it not be better to confine that to some officer or officers of the Government? The reason I have offered this amendment was to limit it to officers of the Government.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. We have set up the American Bureau of Shipping, which is a governmental agency, and which we hope will grow in usefulness. I think it is essential that this American Bureau of Shipping should be designated in here specifically as the authority in respect to this matter. We want to build up if we may through that agency something in the process of time which will at least approximate in usefulness to this country what the British Board of Trade is to Great Britain.

Mr. DEAL. I would like to have the gentleman answer my question directly. He is consuming my time.

You add, after the American Bureau of Shipping—or such other American corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping as may be selected by him.

If you are trying to set up the American Bureau of Shipping, why bring in any of these other corporations?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Because, as I tried to explain a moment ago, this American Bureau of Shipping is a comparatively new organization. It does not have representatives in all of the ports of the United States, and it seems unwise in the extreme that because of a lack of facilities we should delay the effective date when this law shall apply. It is necessary in the judgment of the committee, and in the judgment of every person who ever appeared before the Merchant Marine Committee of the House and testified with respect to this matter, that there should be latitude of this character in order that exigencies and emergencies might be met.

Mr. DEAL. But the Government has officers in all of our seaports.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. But they are assigned duties now, and presumably they are occupied with those duties.

Mr. GARBER. Surely their duties are not so onerous as to incapacitate them for doing this.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If they are not, then the Secretary of Commerce may designate them for this task.

Mr. GARBER. Why delegate a power of this kind to private parties?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Because we think it is a wise provision.

Mr. GARBER. Can the gentleman cite any precedent for it?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. And personally the chairman of the committee thinks that this is a wise provision.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I would not object to incorporating the American Bureau of Shipping, which is a governmental agency, as I understand from the chairman of the committee, but we have incorporated a number of other corporations that may fix these load lines in the discretion of the Secretary, and my idea is that we should select some officer in every port under the employ and control of the Government, and the Secretary of Commerce certainly has within his control and jurisdiction a sufficient number of officers to establish these load lines without creating or giving to private corporations the power to exercise these functions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. There is apparently a confusion about the purpose of this language in the bill. While it is true that the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to establish rules and regulations, and in effect to fix load lines upon vessels, yet the Secretary of Commerce himself is not prepared to determine where those load lines shall be fixed, and neither is anyone else engaged in the Department of Commerce. It is true there are Government officials in the various ports of the United States, but with perhaps a few rare exceptions, and only incidentally so then, those officials are not prepared to make the surveys of these vessels in order to determine where the load lines shall be fixed. That must be done by experts, expert marine engineers, and those who have become familiar with the experience of vessels on the sea.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Permit me to say that it is a matter of formula, taking into consideration the beam of the ship, the draft of the ship, the length of the ship. The tonnage is simply a matter of formula, determining where the load line is.

Mr. DAVIS. That is true with respect to vessels of the same type, of the same tonnage, engaged in the same trade, but not otherwise. Different rules and regulations will have to be made with respect to different types of ships and in different trades.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. My time is limited. Even then, if the rules and regulations and methods of computation are to be applied to a particular vessel of a certain type and in a certain trade, a survey must be made of that vessel, applying those rules and regulations, in order to determine where the load lines shall be fixed beyond which it is unsafe to load the vessel.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield for a question.

Mr. DEAL. The gentleman says that it is necessary to have experts to determine the load lines?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. DEAL. Are these private corporations supposed to be experts, and are they to be paid, or is the work to be done gratis?

Mr. DAVIS. Take the American Bureau of Shipping. That is one of their chief functions, and they have in their organization men capable of doing that. In other words, the American Bureau of Shipping is the American organization that corresponds to the British Lloyds; and we are undertaking, as suggested by the chairman of the committee, to build up a strong, efficient American bureau, capable of rendering full and efficient and comprehensive service with respect to the survey of our vessels.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for information?

Mr. DAVIS. And so it is contemplated that the Secretary of Commerce will use the American Bureau of Shipping when available; but this bill requires that the law shall go into effect within 18 months after passage.

And there are thousands of ships upon which the load line must be fixed before it goes into effect, otherwise they would be violating the law. There may be instances in which for one reason or another the American Bureau of Shipping is not able or has not the time to make the survey and to fix the load lines; and with respect to the provision on page 3, beginning on line 4, and continuing through the rest of the page the purpose of that, as explained to the committee at the hearings, as I remember it, is that American ships may engage in the indirect foreign trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman inform the membership of the committee as to the extent of the organization referred to as the American Bureau of Shipping?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. The American Bureau of Shipping has been in existence for several years. It has rendered and is rendering a splendid service, and as a matter of fact a majority of our American ships now engaged in the foreign trade, at least, and many of them in the coastwise trade, have voluntarily had their ships surveyed and had loan lines placed upon them, because they themselves had regard for the safety of their crews and of their passengers and of their cargo and their own property.

Mr. GARBER. And it has its representatives in nearly all the ports of the country?

Mr. DAVIS. Most of them.

Mr. GARBER. It is too bad that the responsibility for this work should not have been limited to that organization instead of having half a dozen interventions.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the gentleman that I think it will be largely left to the American bureau, but provision is made that if for some reason it is not practicable or possible, then the Secretary of Commerce may, within his discretion, designate somebody else to make the survey.

I started to call attention to the distinction between the authorization on page 3 and that on page 2 of the bill. If you will note, the language on page 3 does not restrict the survey to an American agency. Now, the reason for that, as explained, is this: We may have American ships engaged in indirect trade which do not come to home ports, and in addition to that a vessel may be away from its home port and some accident occurs, the question arises as to whether or not the vessel is in a seaworthy condition, and as to whether or not it can go to sea under that condition with the load line as originally fixed. In order to meet that emergency the Secretary of Commerce may, within his discretion, authorize Lloyds or some other foreign agency to handle the matter in that particular instance. It is expected that this authority will not be exercised except in cases of emergency.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman with a brief question?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have not had opportunity to read the hearings. Can the gentleman inform us as to the probable expense to the owner of a small vessel of from 300 to 500 or a thousand tons, possibly—the expense incident to having his vessel surveyed and having this load line put on it?

Mr. DAVIS. The Commissioner of Navigation of the United States stated at one of our hearings on the subject that the expense would be small, and it is stated by different witnesses that whatever expense may result, which generally speaking is only an expense one time, will be many times overcome by the better freight rates that they will receive on their vessels and the cargo thereon, for the reason that it is regarded by the Government as a safe load-line mark.

Mr. McDUFFIE. You mean insurance rates instead of "freight rates"?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; I mean the insurance rates. I thank the gentleman for the correction. I meant insurance rates. I wish I had the time to read the testimony of the representatives of some of the American marine insurance companies who are strong advocates of this legislation, and who have stated that, if legal load lines are fixed, they will be on a more stable basis and could grant better insurance rates. They also call attention to this situation which exists all the time in this country, that in the absence of load-line marks it is a question of fact to be determined in the courts as to whether the vessel was in a seaworthy condition when it was sent to sea.

For instance, Mr. William D. Winter, the representative of an American marine insurance company, in testifying before our committee on this subject, said in part:

It has been found necessary for the underwriters to protect themselves and to protect the boats that they were insuring, to have warranties put in the insurances that vessels must be loaded under the inspection of those boards. Why was that done? Because there were owners, there were captains, who would willfully overload their vessels and put to sea in an unsafe condition. Now we have no force of law behind those warranties. We can refuse to take insurance; but if we do take the insurance we have merely the reliance on unseaworthiness.

This law would put a mark on the boats that would be a fair mark to the owners, that would be fair to the crews, and would give the underwriters a feeling, at least, that the boats were not overloaded.

Mr. G. C. Morris, representing another American insurance company, testified:

There have been numerous cases where vessels were overloaded. There are American vessels going to sea in that condition now. Whether they are unseaworthy or seaworthy is a question of fact in each particular case.

Mr. Morris gave many specific instances of marine accidents to American ships due to overloading. Among others, he told of the steamer Benjamin Noble being lost, together with her master and crew of 20, and in connection therewith he stated:

As regards leaving the question of the load line to a captain's discretion, I think is a great mistake. In the Benjamin Noble case the language of Judge Tuttle, of the district court, in that case was: "That the master is to the owner as the cabin boy is to the master." In that very case the owner told the captain to take on additional cargo. The captain telephoned there was a question as to whether he could safely take additional cargo and the owner said: "Yes; go ahead and put it all on," and he did it. And any master who does not load as he is told to by his owner has got to look for another job, and the owner will get some one that will obey him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I think there was a perfecting amendment offered there, on page 3, line 9, before the word "approve." I move to insert the word "may," as was suggested by the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: On page 3, line 9, after the word "Commerce," insert the word "may."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Can you not strike out the words "and the Secretary of Commerce approve"? He will not appoint any if he does not approve. It seems to me that language ought to go out.

Mr. BLAND. I have not considered that phase of it. I was not considering that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to strike out the words "which the shipowner may select"?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I move to amend by striking out the word "which" in line 8, page 3, and the word "the" at the end of line 8, page 3, and the words "the Secretary of Commerce approve" to the semicolon in line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin to the amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: Page 3, line 8, strike out the word "which" and the word "the" at the end of that line and the words "the Secretary of Commerce approve."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am sure that the purpose of the gentleman from Wisconsin is entirely proper, but I do not believe that his amendment is in accord with what he has in mind. I want to suggest this: That there are two propositions involved in the language beginning in line 4 and ending in line 9. The first is that the Secretary of Commerce may appoint. The second is that he has the right to approve the agency to be so appointed. Now, suppose the gentleman's amendment is adopted and the Supreme Court, or other courts, should hold, as they sometimes do, that the word "may" shall be construed as "shall." Then there would be an obligation resting upon the Secretary of Commerce to appoint somebody other than the American Bureau of Shipping or other American agency. If we leave the language as it is and adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], which I think is entirely proper, then he would not be under any obligation to designate somebody else or appoint somebody else to make a survey unless he approved that other person. I think that to leave the language in strengthens the idea that he would not be compelled to select somebody simply because that person was requested by a shipowner.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I can not believe that as a matter of statutory construction any court would hold this proviso to be mandatory. There is already a mandatory provision in the first part of the same section, beginning with line 23, page 2, which says:

The Secretary of Commerce shall appoint the American Bureau of Shipping, or such other American corporation or association * * * as may be selected by him—

And so forth. He "shall" appoint.

Then comes the proviso:

Provided, however, That at the request of the shipowner, the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association.

If that "may" means "shall," then we have two contradictory provisions in the same section.

I can not conceive that any court would hold that the words "may appoint" in that proviso mean "shall appoint," and thus compel the Secretary to appoint somebody he might not approve.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I am sure the distinguished gentleman will agree that the courts do sometimes hold that the word "may" shall be construed as "shall."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Let me ask the gentleman if he has ever known of any court decision—in construing such language as is found beginning in line 17, page 2, and the proviso put in at the end—which held that such language is mandatory and that under such language the Secretary must appoint the man the shipowner selects rather than to exercise his discretion?

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield so that I may ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I just want to ask the gentleman this question: Is it not better not to take any chances whatever on it, but to have the bill carry the specific injunction of Congress that such a man must be approved by the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is not any taking of chances at all, and there can not be.

Mr. BRIGGS. The committee thought it would be better to specifically set it forth.

Mr. DAVIS. In conclusion, I want to state that I think the proviso we are discussing is one that should not be used, except in case of an emergency and when there are very great reasons therefor, and I think we ought to have all necessary restrictions thrown around it in order to protect against any abuse of it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Line 23, on page 2, contains this provision:

The Secretary of Commerce shall appoint—

That is mandatory. He—shall appoint the American Bureau of Shipping, or such other American corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping as may be selected by him.

That is a mandatory provision and requires the appointment of an American association or corporation. Then follows the proviso:

Provided, however, That at the request of the shipowner the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping which the shipowner may select and the Secretary of Commerce approve.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee may be extended an additional three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, then, the proviso would permit the appointment of a foreign association. This has been declared on the floor. Therefore it ought not to be, and, in my judgment, is not mandatory but merely permissive. And certainly he would not appoint anybody whom he did not approve.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman will permit, I am in sympathy with the gentleman's suggestion, and I think it is a very helpful one, but let me ask the gentleman if this has occurred to him: Suppose we strike out what the gentleman suggests; might we not be in this difficulty, that the Secretary of Commerce might be in a position of appointing solely upon the request of a shipowner, even though he did not approve of him? Is not the purpose of the part that is left in and is not the prominent thought in it that it must be done on the request of the shipowner, while if you leave the amendment in as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, do you not qualify that by saying it must be an association or agency of which the Secretary may approve?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say in reply to the gentleman from New York that the original language was "which the shipowner may select and the Secretary of Commerce approve," and the amendment just adopted strikes from that language the words "the shipowner may select and."

Mr. DEMPSEY. And that was stricken out on my suggestion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Secretary would certainly approve of his own action.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor, and I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It occurs to me it would serve the purpose manifested in this proviso if the proviso should read as follows:

Provided, however, That at the request of the shipowner the Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, appoint for the purpose aforesaid any other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shiping which the shipowner may select.

Mr. DAVIS. That would answer exactly the same purpose as to leave in the language "which the Secretary of Commerce may approve," and I do not see any need of changing the committee bill; and I want to agree with the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] that it is well for the congressional intent to appear even to the Secretary of Commerce: That we want him to resort to this method only when, in the first place, he thinks there is occasion for appointing somebody else, and, in the second place, only when he approves some other person who is to be selected for this purpose. I think it simply strengthens the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

The amendment offered as a substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSEC. 4. It shall be unlawful for any vessel subject to this section and to the regulations established thereunder to be so loaded as to submerge, in salt water, the load line or lines marked pursuant to this act and to the regulations established thereunder applicable to her voyage; or so as to submerge under like conditions the point where such load line or lines ought to be marked pursuant to the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder; or so as in any manner to violate the said regulations.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 4, line 1, strike out "Subsec." and insert "Sec."; in line 5, page 4, strike out the word "salt" and insert the word "sea"; in line 4, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The provisions of this bill should not apply to the vessels operating exclusively on the Great Lakes. I am very much in favor of the House bill over the Senate bill. The House bill, under its provisions, exempts the Great Lakes.

I do not object to the bill applying to tramp steamers that navigate the 14-foot channel of the St. Lawrence Canal now, but we do not want this law or any law to in any way interfere with the present efficient handling of freight on the Great Lakes.

This load line bill for American vessels is probably in imitation of the British practice, which was an invention of Samuel Plimsoll in 1876, known as the Plimsoll mark, put upon all British vessels. It has to do with the loading of ships in the summer and the winter in the North Atlantic and the Indian Seas in the summer and in fresh water.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just one mark?

Mr. CHALMERS. No; there is an oval and a mark for the different seasons and the different seas.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; exactly.

Mr. CHALMERS. This was invented in the year 1876 and was put on all shipping vessels under British registry. I am very glad, indeed, that the House committee has put in a provision exempting the Great Lakes.

The provisions of this bill should not apply to vessels operating exclusively on the Great Lakes. I do not object to applying it to the tramp steamers that come into the Great Lakes from foreign ports, navigating the present St. Lawrence canals with the depth of only 14 feet. We do object to any law which is not necessary for the protection of life or property that will in any way slow up or interfere with the present efficient handling of freight on the Great Lakes.

This load line act for American vessels is probably an imitation of the Plimsoll mark which was originated by Samuel Plimsoll, of England, in 1876, and is designed to prevent the overloading of vessels. It is placed on the side amidships and is usually seen not far above the water line. There is a white circle crossed by a number of horizontal straight lines designated by the letters S., W., W. N. A., I. S., and F. W., marking the level beyond which the vessel must not be loaded under various conditions, as "Summer," "Winter," "Winter North Atlantic," "Indian Seas in Summer," and "Fresh Water."

Every British ship and all others trading in British ports are obliged to carry this marking and sailors can not be compelled to sail on a ship loaded beyond this freeboard marking.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSEC. 5. Whenever the Secretary of Commerce shall certify that the laws and regulations in force in any foreign country relating to load lines are equally effective with the regulations established under this act, the Secretary of Commerce may direct, on proof that a vessel of that country has complied with such foreign laws and regulations, that such vessel and her master and owner shall be exempted from compliance with the provisions of this section, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That this subsection shall not apply to the vessels of any foreign country which does not similarly recognize the load lines established under this act and the regulations made thereunder.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 4, line 13, strike out "Subsec." and insert "Sec." In line 21, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act"; and in line 22, strike out the word "subsection" and insert in lieu thereof the word "section."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSEC. 6. It shall be the duty of the master of every vessel subject to this section and to the regulations established thereunder and of every foreign vessel exempted pursuant to subsection 5 of this section, before departing from her loading port or place for a voyage by sea, to enter in the official log book of such vessel a statement of the position of the load-line mark applicable to the voyage in question with reference to the actual water line at the time of departing from port as nearly as the same can be ascertained.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 5, line 1, strike out "Subsec." and insert "Sec."; in line 2, strike out "section" and insert "act"; in line 4, strike out the words "subsection 5 of this section" and insert "section 5"; in line 8, strike out the words "with reference to the actual water line" and insert "and the actual drafts forward and aft."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSEC. 7. If any collector of customs has reason to believe, on complaint or otherwise, that a vessel subject to this section and to the regulations established thereunder is about to proceed to sea from a port in the United States or its possessions within his district when loaded in violation of subsection 4 of this section, or that any vessel exempted pursuant to subsection 5 of this section is about to proceed to sea from such port when loaded in violation of the laws and regulations of her country with respect to load line, he may by written order served on the master or officer in charge of such vessel detain her provisionally for the purpose of being surveyed. The collector shall then serve on the master a written statement of the grounds of her detention and shall appoint three disinterested surveyors to examine the vessel and her loading and to report to him, whereupon the said collector may release or may by written order served on the master or officer in charge of such vessel detain the vessel until she has been reloaded in whole or in part so as to conform to subsection 4 of this section; in case of a vessel exempted pursuant to subsection 5 of this section, so as to conform to the laws and regulations of her own country with respect to load line. If the vessel be ordered detained, the master may, within five days, appeal to the Secretary of Commerce, who may, if he desires, order a further survey, and may affirm, set aside, or modify the order of the collector. Clearance shall be refused to any vessel which shall have been ordered detained.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 5, line 11, strike out "Subsec." and insert "Sec."; page 5, line 13, strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act"; page 5, line 16, strike out "subsection 4 of this section" and insert "section 4"; page 5, line 17, strike out "subsection 5 of this section" and insert "section 5"; page 6, line 4, strike out "subsection 4 of this section" and insert "section 4"; page 6, line 6, strike out "subsection 5 of this section" and insert "section 5."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figure "4" where it appears in line 16, page 5. It should have been stricken through, but was not done in printing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that it is stricken through in the printing, although it does not show plainly, and it is so reported by the Clerk.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In line 4, page 6, in the text I have, the number "4" is not stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The same situation applies in regard to that.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it to direct the chairman's attention to the language of this section, and especially in line 12, page 5, the words "on complaint or otherwise." Whose complaint? Can not you imagine a situation where a disgruntled seaman might cause the delay of a vessel at a cost of many thousands of dollars—which is always incident to the delay of a big vessel—because of some effort on his part to get even with the owner or the master for some alleged wrong? I think you ought to say what kind of a complaint, formal or informal, might or should be acted on—giving to certain officials or other authorities the right to make complaint, and possibly let the complaints be made formally in writing. Then clothe the collector of customs with authority to say whether the complaints have any just foundation. In other words, let the complaints come from responsible sources.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The gentleman is directing his remarks to me?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think that the language is proper and should be retained. The collector will act only as he believes the facts alleged are true; so I can not conceive that it makes any difference from what source the facts are brought to his knowledge.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Suppose some competitor had loaded his ship and was ready to sail, in which a delay meant much money, and a complaint is made with no foundation whatever. The very making of complaint might serve to bring about delay of the vessel, and the delay of a vessel, even for the purpose of investigation, might mean considerable additional cost.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Unless the collector believes there is foundation for the complaint no action would be taken. I can conceive that there might be some annoyance and some delay, but that would be preferable to allowing a vessel to sail in violation of law.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I entirely agree with the gentleman, so far as that is concerned, but I very much fear this section is opening up the way for unnecessary delay and trouble.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this refers specifically to section 4, and section 4 makes it unlawful for a vessel to be submerged above the load line, and that is a matter that could be seen in a minute. It would not involve a survey, but this violation, this submerging of a vessel above the load line could be seen by the collector of customs, who is right there in the port. If anybody is aggrieved and makes complaint, the collector can in a short time determine whether she is overloaded and about to put to sea with her load line submerged. It could not cause much delay, and whatever delay might be occasioned ought to be submitted to if the collector has reason to believe she is violating the law in that respect.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is only a matter of visual observation.

Mr. DAVIS. That is all.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If we make this bill the law, it should be observed, of course, and no ship should go to sea when by so doing life and property is endangered. I was afraid from the language of the section there might be room for fear of unnecessary delay for various reasons growing out of this section. It is the manner in which ships are loaded rather than overloading that brings trouble.

Mr. DAVIS. It can not be assumed that the collector of customs is going to abuse the authority.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman will yield, it seems to me that the gentleman has overlooked the real significance of section 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The criterion there set up at the beginning of section 7 is not the fact that complaint has been made, but the criterion is whether the collector has reason to believe it. It does not make any difference how many complaints are made which are unfounded, which are malicious, which have no foundation in fact—they have no effect under this act—the sole gauge is, Has the collector honest reason to believe them?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I understand that, but I do not concede that answers the criticism I have of this section. However, this committee has doubtless studied these provisions, and I do not set myself up as a past master in passing judgment on what they are doing. I simply rose to call attention to what I thought was the danger of delay to vessels. Of course, it goes to his discretion, after all, but it takes time to make the investigation. If it be a simple question of observation of a line, and that is all, why, that is somewhat different; but I can imagine a situation where it would mean more than the observation of a line on various informal complaints from various kinds of persons. I still think there is danger of delaying vessels by this section.

Mr. DEMPSEY. You can not prevent complaints if you put it in the act, and the act would remain exactly the same if we left out the words "on complaint or otherwise." The result of the act would be precisely the same.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSEC. 8. (a) If the owner or master of any vessel subject to this section and to the regulations established thereunder shall permit her to depart from her loading port or place without having complied with the provisions of subsection 3 of this section, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $500. If the owner or master of any vessel exempted pursuant to subsection 5 of this section shall permit her to depart from her loading port or place without having the load line or lines required by the laws and regulations of the country to which she belongs marked upon her as required by said laws and regulations, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $500. The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, remit or mitigate any penalty imposed under this paragraph, or discontinue prosecution therefor on such terms as he may deem proper.

(b) If the master of any vessel subject to this section and to the regulations established thereunder, or of any foreign vessel exempted pursuant to subsection 5 of this section, shall fail, before departing from her loading port or place, to enter in the official log book of such vessel the statement required by subsection 6 of this section, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $100. The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, remit or mitigate any penalty imposed under this paragraph.

(c) If any person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause any vessel subject to this section and to the regulations established thereunder to depart, or if, being the owner, manager, agent, or master of such vessel, he shall fail to take reasonable care to prevent her from departing from her loading port or place when loading in violation of subsection 4 of this section, or if any person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause a foreign vessel exempted pursuant to subsection 5 of this section to depart, or if, being the owner, manager, agent, or master of such vessel, he shall fail to take reasonable care to prevent her from departing from her loading port or place when loaded more deeply than permitted by the laws and regulations of the country to which she belongs, he shall, in respect of each offense, be guilty of a misdemeanor, unless her going to sea in such condition was, under the circumstances, reasonable and justifiable, and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $500.

(d) If the master of any vessel or any other person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause any vessel to depart from any port or place in the United States or its possessions in violation of any order of detention made pursuant to subsection 7 of this section, he shall, in respect of each offense, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $500 or by imprisonment not to exceed three months, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

(e) If any person shall conceal, remove, alter, deface, or obliterate or shall suffer any person under his control to conceal, remove, alter, deface, or obliterate any mark or marks placed on a vessel pursuant to this section or to the regulations established thereunder, except in the event of lawful change of said marks, or to prevent capture by an enemy, he shall in respect of each offense be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

(f) Whenever the owner, manager, agent, or master of a vessel shall become subject to a fine or penalty by way of money payment pursuant to the provisions of this section, the vessel shall also be liable therefor and may be seized and proceeded against in the district court of the United States in any district in which such vessel may be found.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 6, line 18, strike out "subsection 3 of this section" and insert "section 3."

Page 6, line 20, strike out "of" and insert "not to exceed."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the amendment just reported.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will permit, the Chair will first put the amendments previously reported. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments down to and including the amendment in line 18, but not including the amendment in line 20.

The amendments referred to were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment in line 20, to strike out "of" and insert "not to exceed."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the method of collecting penalties for fixed offenses subject to remittance and mitigation by the head of the department under which the activity which has been violated comes is a fixed policy in all the various departments of the Government where such penalties are applicable. It is the policy, and has been for many years, both in the Department of Commerce and the Department of the Treasury, and possibly in other departments. That means that a fixed penalty is imposed for an offense. As soon as the offense, which is usually one that can be ascertained by inspection, such as to whether a stamp is placed on a certain package, or whether this load-line regulation has been violated, or as to whether other navigation laws have been violated, being matters of visual inspection, is established a penalty adheres, and is reported to the head of the department. Then the person has an opportunity to present any circumstances or facts in mitigation of the offense, and those can be adjudicated by the head of the department. As soon as you fix a movable penalty, it is not technically a penalty, but a fine, and the Government must prosecute in a court of law.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I think the criticism of the gentleman from New Jersey is correct, and, speaking personally, I am quite content that the committee amendment should not be approved. I have not had opportunity to speak to the other members of the committee and I can not speak for them.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] simply opposes the committee amendment striking out the word "of" and inserting the words "not to exceed"?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I am in thorough accord with that, and so expressed myself in the committee.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I, therefore, hope the committee amendment may not prevail in this instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the further committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 21, strike out "subsection 5 of this section" and insert "section 5."

Page 7, line 8, strike out "subsection 5 of this section" and insert "section 5."

Page 7, line 11, strike out "subsection 6 of this section" and insert "section 6."

Page 7, line 22, strike out "subsection 4 of this section" and insert "section 4."

Page 8, line 13, strike out "subsection 7 of this section" and insert "section 7."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls attention to the fact that there is an apparent misprint in line 17, page 6, where the word "compiled" should be "complied." Without objection, that will be corrected.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In paragraph (e) of section 8, why is the penalty for defacing all of the lines twice as much, plus a jail term, as for willful violation of the act? I have no particular interest in it, but I can not understand that.

If somebody gets up and defaces the load-line mark, he is subjected to a fine of $1,000; but if the shipmaster willfully sails without obeying the law, he can only be fined $500. I just wondered which is the most serious offense.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The person who defaces or obliterates the load line of another's vessel commits an offense akin to burglary.

Mr. BEGG. It does not have to be that. It can be the captain himself, if he wants to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that if a master willfully disregards the provision as to loading and overloads his ship, there are a great many other penalties that result, such as the cancellation of his insurance.

Mr. BEGG. The captain of the vessel may load within the load-line limit, and yet if he defaces that load line he is subject to twice the penalty.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the owner of a house breaks a window in it, he is not a culprit as is the sneak thief that comes along and breaks the window.

Mr. BEGG. I do not see anything to it.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say more than what has been said by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEAL: Page 7, line 16, after the word "any," strike out the word "person" and insert "owner, manager, agent, or master."

On page 7, line 19, after the word "vessel," strike out the word "he."

On line 22, page 7, after the word "any," strike out the word "person" and insert "owner, manager, agent, or master."

On line 25, after the word "if," strike out the word "being."

On page 8, line 1, after the word "vessel," strike out the word "he."

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. Why do you want this penalty applied to any person? It seems to me there ought to be some limit. You do not want to make anyone who might possibly have knowledge about this matter amenable to punishment.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It is meant to apply to any person who comes within the purview of this language:

If any person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause any vessel subject to this section—

And so forth. As I explained, you have designated certain persons and corporations. You are narrowing and limiting the scope of the section, and the word "person" is all-inclusive and all-comprehensive, and I think it ought to be.

Mr. DEAL. I think it ought to be narrowed. You ought not to cover the whole field of individuals. We ought to have some limit to it and not make it apply to every person.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman favor exempting from this penalty the customs collector who knowingly clears a vessel improperly loaded?

Mr. DEAL. No.

Mr. LEHLBACH. You would.

Mr. DEAL. I am in favor of relieving persons who might possibly be responsible, but who are not. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that the committee is going about as far to an extreme in one direction as I would be going in the other. I would be in favor of putting the collector of customs in.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This being a penal provision, the language ought to be broad.

Mr. DEAL. We ought to have it clear. That is why I offer the amendment. I am perfectly willing to put in the collector of customs or any other officer of the Government.

Mr. GIFFORD. When this matter was before the committee somebody suggested that we would not want to stand on a wharf and see a vessel depart improperly loaded. There might be a penal clause enacted to the effect that no person should stand by and see another person murdered, or something of that sort. They say you must have a permit before you are liable. This word "person" is all-inclusive. We did bring up the question whether or not it did not include anybody. We sympathize with the gentleman's attitude.

Mr. DEAL. I am glad the question was raised in committee. I think it ought to be corrected here. You can put in any Government officials you please. I have no objection to putting in every Government officer, but I do object to holding any person liable to a penalty who has no connection with the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in line 16, page 8, to strike out "three months" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two years."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER: Page 8, line 16, strike out "three months" and insert "two years."

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal of discussion about this measure. We have been told it was a measure to protect not only property but human life. The majority of the Members of this House are continually talking about law enforcement and respect for law, both in this Chamber and outside. The body at the other end of the Capitol has just recently passed legislation to increase the penalties in case of a violation of the prohibition law. Under the present law a soft-drink parlor keeper in the city of Milwaukee who violates the Volstead Act is sent to jail for six or eight months if he sells beer having an alcoholic content of more than one-half of 1 per cent.

I believe that if the pending load line bill is to mean anything you must have greater penalties than a three months' jail sentence. In view of the fact that this is a bill to protect human life and since a majority of the membership of this House is continually advocating the observance and enforcement of law, I believe this amendment should be adopted by the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. LELHBACH. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that in view of the fact that an offender under this law shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and tried before a jury it would be asinine to provide a penalty of two years in jail. If that were done you would not convict anybody, and if the amendment should be adopted it would be in the interest of the law breaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. Page 8, line 14, strike out the word "misdemeanor" and substitute in lieu thereof the word "felony," and in line 16 strike out the words "three months" and insert in lieu thereof "two years."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment is not in writing and is not submitted in writing at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present in order that I may have an opportunity to reduce the proposed amendment to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that a quorum is not present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-nine are present, a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I now demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Wisconsin offered an amendment, whereupon the gentleman from Alabama made the point of order that the amendment was not in order for the reason that it was not reduced to writing.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER: Page 8, line 14, strike out "misdemeanor" and insert "felony"; in line 16, page 8, strike out "three months" and insert "two years."

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to observe that I think the gentleman in offering his amendment is laboring under a misapprehension of fact. He has made a comparison between the Volstead Act and the present bill, the so-called "load line bill." I call his attention to the fact that in this bill there is a provision that the load line be marked so that it may be discerned readily, while in the Volstead Act there is no provision either for marking the load line or defining it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield to the gentleman, because I recognize him as an authority on this question.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman has overlooked the fact, however, that this bill refers in several places to schooners.

Mr. BEEDY. Well, in that respect there may be an exact parallel.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment, which is the insertion of a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, after line 8, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 9. This act shall not apply to vessels operating exclusively on the Great Lakes or to barges otherwise coming within the provisions of this act or to lumber schooners operating to and from territory contiguous to the United States."

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition in support of the committee amendment.

This section, as I conceive it, is the one in real controversy in this proposed legislation; and, as briefly as I can, I want to give the membership of the committee the considerations which influenced the Merchant Marine Committee in reporting this amendment by unanimous vote.

First of all, let me allude to some general considerations which in the opinion of the committee warranted the inclusion of the coastwise trade within the terms of this bill.

Foremost was a consideration of the safety of human life. The coastwise trade of the United States involves voyages greater than many voyages in the foreign trade. As I suggested day before yesterday, a voyage from a port of New England to a port in the Gulf, a voyage from a port on the Atlantic coast down through the canal to the Pacific coast, exceeds in distance many of the voyages in foreign trade to the ports of the world.

There is nowhere on the waters of the earth greater danger to navigation than in this coastwise trade of ours. There is nowhere more hazard to the ship engaged in trade than to the ship engaged in the coatswise trade—a hazard resulting from a congestion of ships along our seaboard and a hazard following from geographic conditions upon our coast. It is known to everyone who goes down to the sea in ships that there are no more dangerous waters in all the world than those surrounding Cape Cod, up in New England, and those about Hatteras, down off North Carolina. Those waters from time immemorial have been designated as a graveyard of ships, and because of this, because of this hazard to ships, which involves the safety of life, the safety of ships, the safety of cargoes, the Merchant Marine Committee believe that the coastwise shipping should be covered by this amendment.

Then there is another consideration which influenced some of us. For more than 100 years the coastwise trade of the United States has been a monopoly protected from all foreign competition. It seems to me that there is no business in the whole of these United States that has received greater consideration from those in legislative authority than the coastwise trade of the United States. If we are to give it monopoly, if we are to protect it from the assault of the foreign vessel, that coastwise trade of the United States ought willingly to submit itself to reasonable rules and regulations in behalf of ship and of the crew thereon; and it is not in good conscience, in my judgment, for the coastwise trade of the United States to now voice its opposition to humanitarian legislation of this character. [Applause.]

Then there is a further consideration. Here in the United States we talk about our country as being a leader among the nations of the world in behalf of humanity. We have written into this law, in its general provisions, that the coastwise trade of the United States shall come within its terms and that it shall apply to vessels of over 250 tons. And what do we see as we look about and regard the legislation of other nations?

Canada, on the north, has a load line law applying to vessels in its foreign trade and applying to vessels in its coastwise trade in excess of 150 tons, and we have raised that limit by 100 tons over the law of Canada; Germany, with a coastwise load line law requirement; France with a coastwise load line law requirement; and Great Britain with a coastwise load-line requirement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. What is the law of Great Britain? Why, Great Britain requires the load-line mark upon vessels in her foreign trade and upon vessels in her coastwise trade in excess of 80 tons, and we place the limit at 250 tons.

And, again, I say that there is no justification for complaint by the coastwise trade of the United States at the treatment received by them from the hands of the Merchant Marine Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In just a moment, please.

We have made certain exceptions. I indicated in speaking here the other day that if I could isolate these propositions and deal with them singly, apart from every other consideration, they would not find great favor in my mind.

These exceptions are three in number. First, we have excluded from the operation of this law traffic upon the Great Lakes in its entirety, and I approve of that exception if for no other reason than that the Dominion of Canada does not require a load line upon her vessels upon the Great Lakes, and I want the vessels of the United States in operation upon the Great Lakes to be on terms of equality there with the vessels of Canada.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In just a moment.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. We gave the gentleman additional time, and I think the gentleman might yield for one question.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman now put commercial interest above humanity?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. No; I do not. I will stand on what I have said with respect to that.

Then we have exempted from the operation of this proposed law the barges. If I had my individual way I would not have excluded barges from the operation of this law, but it was a compromise required if we were to bring out legislation with the general approval of the entire committee, and as an integral part of the compromise I stand for that proposition. It is not so important after all. We have in the whole United States barges affected by this provision amounting to not over 800,000 or 900,000 tons; that is, 800,000 to 900,000 tons out of a coastwise and foreign tonnage of all of 15,000,000 tons, which means about 6 per cent of the total tonnage of the United States; and in the interests of this legislation I was willing, in the committee, as I am willing now, to yield to that exception, and I stand for it. We have also extended this exemption to lumber schooners operating to and from territory contiguous to the United States. Now, I venture the assertion that if these lumber schooners do not accept the terms of this law they will have to take the load line of Canada and they better be under the terms of this bill.

In the judgment of the committee that was essential if we worked out an agreement. I stand for it because the number of these schooners is not great and the tonnage affected is not great in comparison with the entire coastwise trade of the United States. They get the benefit of the exemption only when engaged in foreign trade. If these same vessels enter into coastwise trade with the United States the provisions of this bill will apply to them, and the load line will have to be marked thereon.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman means to say that there was no possibility of getting a report of the committee without this?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. A vessel in the coastwise trade is not prejudiced by this exception. Any schooner operating to contiguous territory, if it returns to the coastwise trade, must apply the load line law. It thereby comes within the terms of the bill.

My friends, I want to ask you men of the House whether we should have less consideration for American sailors than other nations have for their nationals. I want the United States to be the leader and not the laggard in humanitarian legislation. I hope this compromise by the committee will be approved by this House in its entirety. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman said that lumber schooners operating between the United States and contiguous territory might find that they would be subject to the Canadian load line law?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How so?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Canada has a load line law, and if it were not for the grace and consideration of Canada heretofore everyone of these vessels would have a load line marked upon their hulls now. We have received many warnings that unless we legislate and put on the statute books a load line law the grace heretofore extended to us will be withdrawn. This exemption applies only to vessels engaged in a traffic between a port in the United States and territory contiguous to the United States. For a practical illustration, a vessel plying between Seattle and some Canadian port. The exception does not apply to a vessel between Seattle and Portland, Oreg., or San Francisco.

Mr. EATON. Does it apply to the whole South American Continent?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. No; that would be foreign trade. Mexico would be contiguous.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then the gentleman uses Canada for the application when he means Mexico?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I mean both.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Why was greater consideration shown for seamen operating lumber schooners between the States and those operating between the States and foreign ports?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I have covered that; that was a compromise insisted on by some of those who assumed to speak in behalf of this particular character of trade. I am not withholding anything from the House. It was put in as a compromise, which was necessary to secure for this bill the unanimous support from the Merchant Marine Committee, and because it is of negligible importance as compared with the whole thing involved here. I accept it and I stand for it and ask the House to support it. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman think it is necessary to obtain a unanimous report from his committee before bringing legislation before the House for consideration?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do not, but I think it is very desirable at this stage of the session of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. And I shall ask if this is not also true: That our committee would not be reached again during the session, and it was necessary to obtain a rule from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is correct.

Mr. DAVIS. Before we could get the bill up at all; and if we came in with a highly controversial bill there would not be any chance of passing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington to the committee amendment: Page 9, line 12, after the word "operating," insert "in the coastwise trade of the United States or."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So that it will read:

or to lumber schooners operating in the coastwise trade of the United States or to and from territory contiguous to the United States.

The amendment offered by the committee, which appears in italics, provides that lumber schooners may operate to and from territory contiguous to the United States.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Without the load line.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Without the load line. Lumber schooners of the type that I have in mind are not easily marked with a load line. They may make some kind of a mark under the earlier provisions of the bill, but it seems to me that it would be peculiar legislation to require a load-line mark on a vessel making trips of anywhere up to 1,800 miles in the coastwise trade, stopping at United States ports, and not require the load line along the same trip to farther and contiguous territory. I do not care to discuss the amendment further, but with all that has been said as to the safety of life and property at sea, I am in accord. The reports read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] showed lives lost last year in the coastwise trade to number 14 and vessels to number 51. These lumber schooners are not sinkable. Some of them practically have no deck at all. Sometimes they get water-logged. The great danger to life and property comes from the lack of aids to navigation in the way of lighthouses. If we would put our attention there, and lighted our coast up as the British nation has lighted the west of Canada, we would have fewer ships missing harbors that are two or three hundred miles apart. I ask that you adopt this perfecting amendment.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the Johnson amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 9, strike out lines 12 and 13 and insert in lieu thereof "or to vessels exclusively engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman is an amendment in the third degree, and the proper course would be to wait until action is taken on the Johnson amendment.

Mr. BLAND. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition on the Johnson amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to debate the Johnson amendment.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I am for the Johnson amendment, if my amendment is not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not in order at this time, as it is an amendment in the third degree. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, section 9 is objectionable to all who are sincere advocates of legislation looking toward the safety of life at sea. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] and the proposed amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH] do not correct the defects but simply enlarge and bring into the exemption other classes of vessels. This proposition is very simple. If it is necessary, and it is—we have the experience of a hundred years—to establish load lines, then I respectfully submit that it is childish and ridiculous to exempt any class of ships. I say that old Father Neptune, just when he is about to turn loose the elements, is not going to inquire whether a ship is engaged in the coastwise service or in the foreign trade. The ships navigate the same waters. They are subjected to the same elements, and we should not make any exemptions at this time. If we are going to exempt any class of ships, we should be perfectly frank about it. Even a consideration of this section reveals that any contemplated exemption is not based on any justifiable reason, but simply to favor some particular class of shipowners. That is wrong—bad legislation, and should not be approved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think that Father Neptune, when he is about to loose the winds and waves, will pay particular attention as to whether a lumber schooner is operating to contiguous territory?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; and therefore I am against the whole section. I would make no exemptions or exceptions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But it is well to perfect it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I appeal to the House to vote section 9 out of the bill. We are doing a good day's work to-day. When we pass this bill, this House to-day is establishing a record in this kind of legislation. I repeat what I said in my main remarks, that it took 20 years for the British Parliament to pass the first load line bill. Let us profit by their experience and make a real job of it. With the exception of section 9, you have here a good bill. I know that the chairman of the committee down in the bottom of his heart is in sympathy with the bill without section 9. I understand fully the parliamentary situation and the necessity at times to compromise. But we can not, and must not, compromise when human lives are involved.

I understand the legislative desirability of eliminating opposition at times, but in this instance, and in the light of past experience, we should stand firm and resist all attempts for special privileges. I can understand the situation in the committee, in putting in this section, in order to remove, if possible, opposition coming from groups that are particularly interested. I can see here a situation where the whole Great Lakes delegation and the Pacific coast delegation and the North Atlantic group, by joining together, might defeat this bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But the gentleman from New York agrees that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] should be made a part of this section if it becomes a law. It is perfectly illogical to say that a schooner going from one State to another should have a load line while a schooner going to a foreign port should not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am in favor of eliminating all of section 9. That takes care entirely of the illogical situation suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. BACON. If the gentleman offers that as an amendment, I shall be glad to vote with him.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman. I urge all Members to join in voting down the committee amendment. If section 9 remains in the bill, I predict that it will haunt this House some day in the near future. Let us not be so short of vision as to await a terrible calamity, another tragedy of the sea, before we act. We owe as much to the men engaged in coastwise service as we do the others. No fair-minded, honest shipowner in this day and age can object to a load line law. This is a good bill without section 9. So let us keep that section out.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am going to support the Johnson amendment and not press the one that I have just sent up to the desk. And in doing so I am fully at ease with my conscience. I think the Members of the House and the members of the committee who have this bill under consideration are, one and all, first concerned in conserving human life. I do not believe there is a Member of this House who would for one minute consider the question of placing property before human life.

Now then, does this requirement of a load line applying to lumber schooners conserve human life? That is the question at issue now. Does it make for the safety of human life, or does it not? I have taken the trouble—and I hope other members of the committee have done so—to read the hearings given before the committee having the bill in charge.

There you have the most expert civilian witnesses called before that committee and testimony also coming from a high naval authority to the effect that a load line on a coastwise schooner or coastwise ship does not add to human safety. The first witness called was Capt. Walter J. Peterson, representing the American Ship Owners' Association and the Ship Owners' Association of the Pacific coast. He went into the history of this load-line legislation, and he gave to that committee statistics from 1907 to 1928, inclusive, in which he showed that there were 444 coastwise marine accidents during that time, and there was not one scintilla of evidence in his testimony to show that one of them was caused by overloading. Yet there is no load line governing the loading of ships on the Pacific coast to-day.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I regret I can not yield now.

Mr. BACON. Is the gentleman in favor of overloading?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. No; I am not in favor of overloading.

Mr. BACON. Then, why not have a load line?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. When it comes to the owners of ships sending out valuable vessels loaded with valuable cargoes, not to mention the men on these ships and the captains and the crews—in many instances it was testified that the captains had their families with them—I can say that we can safely leave our coastwise shipping to the people engaged in our coastwise industry, and we do not need to put such a burden or requirement on coastwise shipping as is shown by experience to be needed on deep-sea shipping.

Mr. BACON. What is the burden now?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. For one thing, the captain of a coastwise ship does not need to have the standard qualifications of the captain of an ocean-going ship.

Mr. BACON. What burden are we putting on?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. The burden of governmental regulation on our coastwise shipping trade. Governmental regulation should never be imposed without a proven necessity. I have been acquainted with shipping ever since my sixteenth year, and notwithstanding the statements that have been made I know that the men who go down to the sea in ships are not clamoring for this legislation. They are not demanding these restrictions.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. I can not understand the reason why, if it is dangerous to overload in the foreign service, it is not equally dangerous to overload in coastwise vessels.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Take the Atlantic coast, from Norfolk to Philadelphia, and from Newport News down to Fernandina, and all along the Gulf coast. They never get out of sight of land. They keep within sounding distance. Many of the captains could not take directions 3,000 yards beyond shore. They have their radio signals and their charts and their soundings. They can get their bearings from the shore any time of the day or night.

Mr. HOCH. How about the line from San Francisco to Hawaii? I understand that is considered to be in the coastwise trade.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. You may say that is in the coastwise trade, the Hawaiian Islands being possessions of the United States. I do not think the committee has so considered it.

Mr. HOCH. It is quite a journey.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. That is off the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that so far as Hawaii is concerned, that is deep-sea sailing, and it should have every protection; every protection that should be thrown around the men who go down to sea in ships. But this is a different question from where a man leaves with his lumber schooner, with wife and family on board, to go to Cuba or Porto Rico or South or Central America to bring back lumber. The regular cargo vessels are different from lumber schooners, whether they go to South America or not.

Can anyone with intelligence, and knowing anything about the matter, say that a lumber schooner going from Philadelphia to a port in South America and coming back loaded with lumber ought to be required to load only to the Plimsoll mark? As I said the other day, the more lumber you put on a schooner the greater raft you have. You could not sink it if you wanted to, and when they become derelicts they float around the ocean and become a menace to navigation for years and have to be destroyed by the Coast and Geodetic Survey. They are reported from time to time by vessels of all nations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman contend that it requires less navigation skill and that there is less danger in taking a ship from the port of Philadelphia to Galveston than it requires to take the same ship from Philadelphia to Bordeaux?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I think so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is wrong.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Any sea captain will tell you it does.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman say this, that no matter how high you load a schooner with lumber that the center of gravity of that ship does not change?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. It is not a question of submergence, but it is a question of balancing the cargo.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What about its center of gravity? What happens to that?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. That will depend on the manner in which the ship is loaded and that is done by stevedores under the captain's supervision.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the committee amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine moves that all debate on the committee amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington to the committee amendment. I am in accord with the position stated by the chairman of the committee. Personally I do not think there should be any exceptions made but it was a question of give and take. We compromised upon certain exceptions and we are standing by those exceptions, because we consider it a matter of good faith. However, I am very much opposed to the broadening of those exceptions. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington proposes to broaden this committee amendment so as to exclude from the provisions of the bill all lumber schooners engaged in the coastwise trade. That matter was discussed at length before our committee.

The representative of the Ship Owners' Association of the Pacific Coast and also of the Pacific-American Steamship Association appeared before our committee and expressed apprehension as to whether or not, under the provisions of the bill, the Secretary of Commerce had wide enough latitude and discretion to make a distinction between ordinary cargo vessels and these lumber schooners. So we adopted an amendment to the bill which gives him the broadest sort of discretion, as you will see by reading section 2 of the bill. After his attention was called to the fact that the Secretary would be given the discretion of determining where the load line should be fixed in accordance with the type and character of the vessel, the trade in which it was engaged, and so forth, this representative of the Pacific steamship companies, and especially the lumber schooners—with respect to the bill in all other particulars he gave his approval—said this:

> If we can have the necessary discretion given to the Department of Commerce to meet that condition we have no objection to the bill at all.

This bill is not going to hurt a single, solitary shipowner who does not want to submerge his vessel beyond the line of safety and at the expense of life and property. The gentleman who has just spoken, in response to a question from the gentleman from Kansas, said that he would understand the distinction if he were an experienced seaman. Mr. H. B. Walker, the president of the American Steamship Owners' Association, which has within its membership nearly all of the steamship lines in the Atlantic, including 52 steamship companies with 655 vessels, those engaged in foreign trade and those engaged in the coastwise and intercoastal trade—in fact, it embraces all of those large lines and a large majority of them are engaged in the coastwise trade—appeared before the committee, representing said association, and advocated the bill with certain amendments and advocated its application to all vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. He stated the reasons why it should apply to coastwise vessels the same as the others. I will read the following from his statement.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. What page, please?

Mr. DAVIS. On page 28 he says this—

> Mr. WALKER. As I say, it is recommended that the word "foreign" be deleted and thus make the requirements of the bill applicable to all American flag vessels of 250 gross tons and over.
> Inasmuch as the junction of load-line regulations is to insure, as far as humanly can, safety to life and property at sea, there is no logical reason why the determination of a maximum safe load line should not apply to vessels in the coastal and intercoastal trades with the same force as to those vessels making a foreign voyage by sea. This does not mean that a vessel engaged in the coastwise trade shall be restricted to the same loaded draft as a similar vessel running in a foreign voyage—but if a body of practical men assisted by experts can determine what is the safe loaded draft for a vessel engaged in a foreign voyage, those same practical men and experts can also determine the safe loaded drafts for vessels engaged in coastwise and intercoastal trades.

The determination of maximum load lines for vessels engaged in the coastal and intercoastal trades will tend to the lowering of marine insurance rates for the reason it will put a curb upon the overloading by certain unscrupulous shipowners, which forces, by reason of keen competition, other owners engaged in the same trades to overload their vessels against their better judgment. This overloading results in excessive voyage damages, to cover which the insurance companies must keep up premium rates and, at the same time, it places the lives of the crew in greater jeopardy.

The majority of the shipowners in this country are members of the American Steamship Owners' Association. The majority vote of those members were strongly in favor of applying load-line regulations to coastwise and intercoastal vessels as well as to vessels in the overseas trades.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired, all time on this amendment and all amendments thereto has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FREE) there were—ayes 20, noes 87.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am somewhat confused, and so that the committee may be advised I understand that section 9 now appears as a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 9 is a committee amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So those of us who are against any exemption by voting in the negative section 9 would not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only say that those who are in favor of section 9 should on this question vote "aye," and those who are opposed to section 9 should vote "no."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 109, noes 21.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSEC. 9. This section shall take effect one year after the date of the approval of this act or at such earlier time as the Secretary of Commerce may fix.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of subsection 9 and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 10. This act shall take effect 18 months from and after the date of the approval thereof."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, if no further amendments are to be offered, the committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1781) to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes, had reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered on the amendments. The question is on agreeing to the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. I am opposed to the bill in its present form.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SCHAFER moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, with instructions to report the bill back forthwith, with the following amendment: "Strike out all of section 9."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I submit a point of order on that. That amendment has been adopted in the House.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Section 9 is a committee amendment and has been agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. And the gentleman could have asked for a separate vote on the amendment in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONFERRING OF DEGREE UPON SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the House has been kind enough to grant me leave to speak for one minute, and I wish to take this minute to let you in on a secret. Our Speaker is to leave the chair within a few minutes to go to one of our famous universities, in a city not far away, the University of Pennsylvania, to receive there to-morrow the degree of doctor of laws. [Applause, the Members rising.]

LOAD-LINE LEGISLATION

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have three legislative days within which to extend their remarks on the load line bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the basic principle underlying all load-line legislation is to establish a fair mean in the loading of vessels, having on one hand a due regard for the safety of lives and property at sea, and on the other the very natural and proper desire of shipowners to secure a maximum of service and earnings from his craft.

Senate bill 1781 attempts to enact load-line legislation for the regulation of all merchant vessels of 250 gross tons or over, but as the bill is now presented to us, with the amendments of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, it is indeed a strange creation, straying far from the purpose that inspired Samuel Plimsoll to make his long and valiant fight in the British Parliament for the enactment of freeboard regulations.

The bill, with the committee amendments, is incoherent, inconsistent, and ridiculous. Under it lumber schooners of the United States, carrying cargo that is in itself buoyant, will be subjected to Government load-line regulation. And the most remarkable feature of the bill is that it exempts from load-line restrictions lumber schooners that ply to ports in territory "contiguous to the United States." In other words, American lumber schooners plying to Canada and Mexico are, under the provisions of section 9, exempted from freeboard restrictions. The members of the committee thus stray from that underlying principle of load-line legislation which insists that the first consideration be given to the safety of human life and of property. They thus write into this bill their conviction that load-line legislation is not necessary to save the lives of crews of vessels going from a port in the United States to one in Canada or Mexico, but they insist that such legislation is necessary for the protection of those who would sail from New York, for instance, to Baltimore, or from Philadelphia to the West Indies.

Legislation to establish load lines for American vessels has been considered for years; now the committee, in its haste to bring about its enactment, has shown a willingness to make concessions to certain groups engaged in coastwise shipping and to discriminate against others.

There is not alone a discrimination between lumber schooners engaged in trade to and from territory contiguous to the United States and those engaged in port-to-port trade within the United States; there is a distinction made in favor of Pacific coast shipping.

Much of the shipping by lumber schooners on the west coast is to and from Canadian and Mexican ports. Lumber schooners engaged in this trade are exempted from load-line legislation, but what of the Atlantic coast shipping, where a bulk of the trade is to the West Indies, Panama, northern coast of South America, and Central America? Lumber schooners engaged in this trade will be subjected to the restrictions of the bill before us.

That there is an admitted distinction is shown in a letter from the chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who, on February 14, 1929, in response to an inquiry from John Dowd, president of the Maritime Exchange, 78 Broad Street, New York City, wrote:

I note particularly your reference to that part of section 9 regarding lumber schooners. This amendment was adopted in the identical language proposed by a west coast representative.

Since this concession was made, why should not the committee be willing, and in fact anxious, to give the Atlantic coast schooner interest the same degree of consideration as that shown to similar interests on the Pacific coast.

The State of Maine, in particular, has a most important schooner industry identified with the United States coastwise trade and to the West Indies, Central America, and Panama. Sailing vessels to-day are not even paying their expenses, I am informed, and many of the best schooners are tied up awaiting an improvement in rates. Rogers & Webb advise me in a letter under date of yesterday that two of their 2,200-ton schooners have been tied up in Maine for over a year. I hesitate to see further burdens of governmental regulation placed upon our shipping interests, and I sincerely hope that this bill, in which is incorporated every conceivable inconsistency, will not be enacted into law, much as I favor the underlying principle of freeboard regulation.

Yesterday the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] said he regretted the plane of the speeches against the bill; that they were inspired solely by selfish motives. Yet he asks us, on behalf of the committee, to vote for a bill that includes in one provision (section 9) bold and incontrovertible proof that the committee succumbed to the entreaties of three of his so-called selfish groups.

In the committee report we find the real reason for the immediate enactment of this legislation. It is stated—

> It is especially urgent that a law of this nature be enacted by Congress for this country because of the discrimination which is already practiced against our vessels in foreign ports through their being compelled to comply with foreign requirements in the absence of a law in this country under which reciprocal treatment should be insisted upon.

There you have it! The urgency is really the international situation. It can not be, from the standpoint of the committee, the necessity of saving lives and property at sea. If this were so, there would have been no exemptions for certain favored groups engaged in traffic just as hazardous as coastwise trade and trade to the West Indies, Panama, and so forth.

And since the real urgency arises from the international situation, why should not the committee in its wisdom make ready to accept an amendment that will exempt all barges and lumber schooners as well as all vessels engaged in trade on the Great Lakes? The situation would be amply met by the passage of the original Senate bill.

VIOLATION OF IMMIGRATION LAWS

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD at this point a letter received by me from the Commissioner General of Immigration, Mr. Hull, in reply to one I had written. It deals with the question of illegal admissions, smuggling, and so on.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the exaggerations in some of the notices that have appeared in the press.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. It corrects certain exaggerations that have appeared in print and that have alarmed the public mind unnecessarily.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1929.

Hon. HARRY E. HULL,
Commissioner General of Immigration,
Department of Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HULL: I am in receipt of some inquiries as to violations of the laws restricting immigration. I think they are based on newspaper articles in which it is made to appear that there are wholesale violations of the laws and that almost unlimited numbers of undesirable aliens are finding their way into the country.

I believe the public mind is being alarmed about these reports. I can not believe that there are such unlimited admissions or, rather, violations of the laws. Can you give me any official estimates as to such violations?

I would also be glad to have you suggest anything further that the Congress could do to curb such violations. Personally I have always believed that we have not appropriated enough money to patrol the borders and to stop smugglers of aliens along the seacoasts.

May I also call your attention to the fact that these widely published reports may result in a more widespread belief that it is easy to pass the national barriers and thus result in renewed and increasing efforts on the part of aliens and smugglers to enter the country.

Sincerely,

CYRENUS COLE.

FEBRUARY 21, 1929.

Hon. CYRENUS COLE, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN COLE: You ask in your letter of the 20th instant for an expression of my views generally as to the effectiveness of the Immigration Service in its efforts to prevent the illegal entry of aliens and in effecting the subsequent deportation of those who upon surreptitiously entering elude the vigilance of immigration officers, as well as those who having entered lawfully later become subject to expulsion from the country.

During the fiscal year ended June 30 last there was an average of 811 immigrant inspectors on the field rolls of the Immigration Service and 673 border patrolmen. The great majority of immigrant inspectors was stationed at ports of entry along our border and coasts, the balance being at the principal cities in the interior. The patrolmen were distributed along the 3,000 miles of Canadian and 2,000 miles of Mexican border and parts of the Gulf of Mexico and the Florida coasts.

During the period mentioned the patrol apprehended 25,534 persons of all kinds found engaged in unlawful activities, 23,896 of whom were turned over to immigrant inspectors for further examination and investigation; 18,000 of the 23,896 mentioned were smuggled aliens and 330 were smugglers of aliens. The balance of the persons apprehended was turned over to the various Federal, State, county, and municipal officers interested. Nearly five and one-quarter million miles were patroled by the organization, or an average of over 14,000 miles per day. The transportation consisted of 267 automobiles, 13 trucks, 15 saddle horses, and 7 pack horses.

Though the number of inspectors stationed at interior points in the United States was small as compared with the number at ports of entry, they accounted for a large number of deportations. The total number of aliens apprehended in the interior on warrants and deported was 11,625. This number added to the 18,000 apprehended by the border patrol, the great majority of whom elected voluntarily to depart, makes a grand total of over 29,000 aliens whose removal from the country was effected.

It is true that we have not as many men on our borders nor in the interior of the United States as are desirable, but the Immigration Service is not as impotent to cope with the bootlegging industry as the uninitiated might be led to believe from a reading of the lurid and sensational stories appearing in public print from time to time. Such articles are frequently dressed up with just enough of truth, concrete examples of lawlessness coupled with names, dates, places, etc. (much of it ancient history) as to create an illusion of complete verity.

A large percentage of aliens apprehended confess that sensational stories appearing in the press and magazines of this country are repeated and accepted abroad as true, and in their own cases played no small part in their decision to sever home ties, sell their possessions, and even go into debt to pay their own traveling expenses and the exorbitant charges of unscrupulous agents only to meet disaster at the journey's end and return penniless to the homeland.

We of the service are often truly appalled at the variety and number of false statements concerning immigration matters accepted by the public generally at face value. The most damaging statement and the one that will cause the most hardships in the future is the one that "an alien who succeeds in effecting surreptitious entry into the United States is safe if he can escape detection for five years." This is not true at all. It is not possible for any alien entering surreptitiously on and after July 1, 1924, and without visa, to remain here without sooner or later being detected and deported.

I believe I may fairly say that while articles of the character to which you refer generally contain some truth, they more frequently than not contain more that is false, or misleading, or grossly exaggerated. Such articles are not only unfair to the Immigration Service, but what is infinitely worse encourage many ignorant, misguided aliens to embark upon a venture fated ultimately to end in tragedy.

Let me assure you that the Immigration Service from top to bottom is honest, courteous, and efficient. It is doing a wonderful work and doing it marvelously well. It might do this work better if there were a larger organization.

Very truly yours,

HARRY E. HULL, Commissioner General.

THE CRUISER BILL

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the cruiser bill, and include therein certain comparative tables.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include tables showing comparative cruiser strength—built, building, and authorized—of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan. These tables were prepared from official sources.

The following tables show chronologically all American, British, and Japanese cruisers that are in existence, that are building, and for the building of which appropriations have been definitely made. As at the Geneva naval conference of 1927, "standard tonnage" as defined at the Washington conference has been used throughout. This differs from former American practice in that vessels are rated without any fuel or excess feed water on board. Thus American cruisers of the Omaha class, formerly rated by us as of 7,500 tons each, drop to 6,600 tons according to this international standard ton. Attention is invited particularly to the summary following the main tabulation. All data are as of October 1, 1928.

CRUISERS 20 OR MORE YEARS OLD AND OBSOLETE FOR MILITARY PURPOSES

United States of America						British Empire						Japanese Empire

* Carry guns larger than 6 inches. [2] Australian Navy. [5] Mine-laying cruiser. [6] Laid down. [7] Not yet laid down.

The first thing that strikes the eye in the above tabulation is that the United States has retained 22 obsolete cruisers, of comparatively low speed and short gun range, that aggregate over 164,000 tons, and the Japanese have kept 9 equally obsolete cruisers, totaling 66,040 standard tons. For it was generally agreed at the Geneva 3-power conference that cruisers 20 or more years old might be considered obsolete. But the British have no such deadwood, having scrapped all cruisers built before 1911.

Coming down the tables, it appears that in the 15 years between 1908 and 1923 the United States completed no cruisers, but between 1923 and 1925 commissioned 10 modern 6-inch gun cruisers, of 6,600 standard tons each, that were a part of our 1916 naval program, and were all laid down before the Washington conference. These ten 6-inch gunners are the only modern cruisers the United States has afloat. But in this same period the British naturally built many cruisers for urgent war use. Thus they now have 44 mounting 6-inch guns, 1 mine-laying cruiser, 4 of almost 10,000 tons, each mounting 7.5-inch guns, and 7 postconference cruisers of 10,000 tons, each mounting 8-inch guns, all of which modern completed cruisers aggregate 316,776 standard tons. And in practically the same period the Japanese have completed 26 modern cruisers aggregating 136,415 standard tons.

It may be noted that four of the completed Japanese cruisers mount 8-inch guns, although their individual tonnage is only 7,100, but they are of comparatively short steaming radius. On the other hand, first the British and then the Japanese began in 1924 the building of 10,000-ton cruisers mounting 8-inch guns. It was not until October of 1926, however, that the United States laid down our first such cruiser, following with another single one in 1927 and six more in 1928.

In contrast to these eight cruisers, the construction of which averaged only 32 per cent toward completion on October 1, 1928, the British were building two 8-inch gun cruisers of 8,300 tons and six 8-inch gun cruisers of 10,000 tons, while they have seven 10,000-ton 8-inch gun ships already in commission. They are also about to lay the keel of two 8-inch gun cruisers of 8,300 tons. Likewise the Japanese have completed one, are building six 8-inch gun cruisers of 10,000 tons each, and are about to lay down one more.

The following table therefore summarizes the present cruiser situation:

	United States		British Empire		Japanese Empire
	Number	Tonnage	Number	Tonnage	Number	Tonnage
Obsolete	22	164,100	None.	None.	9	66,040
Modern cruisers completed with guns less than 8-inch caliber	10	66,000	49	246,776	21	98,015
Modern cruisers completed with 8-inch guns	None.	None.	7	70,000	5	38,400
Modern 8-inch gun cruisers building	8	80,000	8	76,600	6	60,000
Modern 8-inch cruisers about to be laid down	None.	None.	2	16,600	1	10,000
Total modern 8-inch cruisers	8	80,000	17	163,200	12	108,400
Total modern cruisers of all calibers built and building	18	146,000	66	409,976	33	206,415

Attention is invited to the fact that the ratio in tonnage of modern cruisers built, building, and about to be built is not the Washington conference ratio of 5–5–3 but 1.8 for the United States, 5 for the British Empire, and 2.5 for the Japanese Empire.

American, British, and Japanese cruisers less than 20 years old and mounting guns of over 6-inch caliber that have been completed, that are being built, or that have been appropriated for or authorized

Before drawing conclusions from the above tabulations, it should be realized that the British cruisers Nos. 47 to 55, therein shown as authorized but not yet building, constitute the remainder of the cruisers authorized under the Birkenhead program of 1925—but only in so far as the latter has been announced. Initial appropriations have been made to start building cruisers No. 49 and No. 50 in the immediate future. On the other hand, it was announced in November, 1927, that the construction of cruisers No. 47, No. 48, and No. 51 would be "postponed"—but not, as some misstate, abandoned. Just when their construction will be undertaken has not been announced.

With this in mind it should be noted particularly that if the British carry out the Birkenhead program, as originally announced, they, with their cruisers now built or building, may be expected to have four 7.5-inch gun cruisers and twenty-four 8-inch gun cruisers completed by about 1932. That is, a total of 28 large modern cruisers with big guns aggregating 267,526 tons.

In contrast to these 28 ships, if the United States Senate does not authorize the fifteen 8-inch gun cruisers now under consideration by it, the United States will have, in 1932, only the 8 such cruisers now under construction, leaving the British with a preponderance of 20. And if the British do not undertake the building of the 3 they have "postponed," but carry out the rest of their program, they will have 25 large, big gun cruisers to 8 for the United States, or a British preponderance of 17.

In other words, if the United States builds 15 more cruisers, and the British carry out their full program, but merely in so far as it has been announced, the British will have a preponderance of 5 large, big gun cruisers in addition to their present preponderance in modern 6-inch gun cruisers. And even if the British never build the 3 cruisers they have "postponed" and the United States builds the 15 cruisers now under consideration in the Senate, the British would still have a preponderance of 2 large, big gun cruisers.

The authorization and prompt construction of these 15 American cruisers would, therefore, leave the United States still below parity in cruisers mounting guns of over 6-inch caliber.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution

Whereas it is the general belief that any successful attempt to secure general improvement in the condition of agriculture in the United States must have as a basic principle the establishment of tariffs which will guarantee to agriculture and stock raising a fair and remunerative home market; and

Whereas the growing importance of livestock in connection with the production of crops and the conversion of crops into meat and its by-products is recognized as essential to successful farming; and

Whereas there is nothing of greater importance than saving our home markets for our own people: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Nebraska request the Senators and Congressmen from Nebraska to use all honorable means to secure prompt enactment by Congress of legislation which will increase tariff protection on meat and its by-products.

W. M. BARBOUR.

STATE OF NEBRASKA, FORTY-FIFTH SESSION,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Lincoln, Nebr., February 19, 1929.

I hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted by unanimous vote of the house of representatives on this date.

FRANK P. CARRICK,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. That is all, Doctor. [Laughter and applause.]

AN ANALYSIS OF THE ANGLO-AMERICAN SITUATION

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, some Members of the House have approached me with a request to make a few parting remarks connected with my philosophy before leaving. And I have consented. [Applause.]

I am not going to expound the socialist theory at this time, of course. Anybody who is interested can easily get a book on the subject or read some of my speeches.

MADE ME A SILENT MAN

As to my experience in the House—while it was a great school for me, it made me a rather silent man. I was up against a stone wall, behind which worked the political machine, and I did not have support enough, being all alone, to either tear down the wall or make an opening in it.

I could have objected, of course, innumerable times to unanimous-consent requests for the building of this bridge or the other or for the granting of a pension to this widow or the other veteran, although reported by the committee. I could have also interrupted almost every one of the speakers with this or the other question, relevant or irrelevant. I could, furthermore, on many occasions have truthfully stated that there was no quorum present and caused the ringing of three bells, which would bring the Members from their offices. And I could have probably made a few more speeches or have some of them printed in the RECORD. All of that I could have done. [Laughter.]

IDEAS BOUND TO GERMINATE AND GROW

Nevertheless, as long as I was alone in this House I thought the best for me to do was to introduce bills pertaining to social legislation, just to show what the socialists would do if they had the power. And while I could not get the bills reported out of the committee, they created a great deal of discussion all over the country, and thus I sowed seed that is bound to germinate and spread ideas which I hope will grow.

Of course, if I had a group of socialists in the House I would undoubtedly have pursued a different policy.

THERE IS ONLY ONE PARTY IN THIS CONGRESS

Under our form of very limited representative parliamentarism—much more limited than in any European country where there is no dictatorship—I exercised reasonably about all the privileges that an individual Member has. In this great country of ours all the legislating is really left to the few leaders of the great party—I mean to the leaders of the Republican-Democratic Party, since there is only one party in this Congress, and especially so in the House.

And this accounts for the backwardness of our country in social-welfare legislation. Members of Congress fritter away their time on petty matters and pay little or no attention to important questions of policy, including the question of war and peace.

EVEN THE MAJORITY CAN NOT ACT

Under the rules, even a majority can be prevented from functioning. A majority of the Members had to petition to have the Dale-Lehlbach bill, for instance, brought up for consideration. But if a majority is prevented from functioning under the rules, it may be less the fault of the rules than it is of the majority.

The prohibition farce is a good example of the hypocrisy in which a nation indulges and tolerates. It is supposed to have made us a better Nation. We are, supposedly, much superior than Prussia—we have prohibition and Prussia has not; but while all our jails are filled to overflowing, and many more are needed, Prussia has just closed down one-fourth of all her jails, because she has not enough criminals to fill them.

CONGRESSMEN ARE ABOVE AVERAGE OF ELECTORATE

As to the membership of the House—well, it has become the custom of late to deprecate Congress, and especially the House of Representatives. Our Members are not, as a matter of fact, equally wise or evenly good—but let me say that they are as wise and as good as the people who elect them. I believe most all of them are above the average of the electorate which they represent. [Applause.] Even the Congressmen from Chicago and New York rank above the people who send them here. [Applause and laughter.]

Undoubtedly we have too many lawyers in this House; more than we can really use for any good purpose. However, all of them are ready talkers and good fellows, even if most of them are as innocent of political economy as they are of the Sanskrit language.

But I like all of them personally, from the illustrious and genial Speaker down to the youngest fledgling, and I wish them all well.

LONGWORTH-TILSON MIGHT HAVE SWEPT THE COUNTRY

The very able gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has now "gone to his reward." He is going to be a judge, which means he is out of politics. But I am sorry to say that the Republican Party did not have the good sense to nominate the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] for Vice President. A ticket LONGWORTH-TILSON would have swept the country just as surely as Hoover-CURTIS. [Applause.] And it would have had the advantage of being partly wet, or, at least, of being perceptibly moist. Well, fate has decreed otherwise, at least for the time being. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, I do not know whether I shall come back to this House. I am not in the fortunate position of a Democratic Member from Alabama or of a Republican Member from Kansas, where the party nomination in the district also means the election as a foregone conclusion. I have to fight, and most of the time I have to fight a combination of the two old parties. Nevertheless, the plurality of my opponent was so small that I have no doubt that I can return to this House if I should decide to try again. [Applause.]

And now to the subject I want to discuss.

EVEN MANY EDITORS DO NOT UNDERSTAND THE MEANING OF THE WORD

Mr. Speaker, just now we hear and read a great deal about the Kellogg pact, renunciation of war, disarmament, arbitration, imperialism, Anglo-French agreement, and so forth. I think it would be of interest to this House and to the country at large to have these questions discussed from the socialist point of view.

To begin with, let us have a few words about the meaning of the word "imperialism." Many people, and even editors—and some of them editors of leading papers—seem to have an idea that the word "imperialism" was in some mysterious way connected with the Kaiser.

And that since America has no Kaiser, how could America have imperialism?

These people do not understand the meaning of the term.

DIFFERENT NATIONS HAVE HELD THE "IMPERIUM" AT DIFFERENT TIMES

The word "imperium" in Latin signified the world rule of the Roman Republic. After the downfall of the Roman Empire, in the early Middle Ages, the Arabs ruled a considerable part of the world and held the "imperium."

Later, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, it seemed that Spain would rule the world. Even little Holland and Sweden held the "imperium" for a short period. Nevertheless, only Great Britain could lay claim to be a world power during the last 150 years, especially after the downfall of Napoleon I.

But the term "imperialism"—as it has been used in an economic sense during the last 100 years—is only very loosely connected with imperialism in a political sense.

The basis for economic imperialism is as follows:

WHY EVERY NATION MUST COMPETE FOR THE WORLD MARKET

Under the capitalist system—which is also called the profit system, or the competitive system, or the wage system—no workman employed for wages in a factory or in a shop or in a mine gets the full value of his product. He can not get the full value if the employer is to stay in business. The employer must make a profit, or the employer would have to go out of business. And the more profit the employer can make, the more successful is he as a business man.

Thus it comes about that the producers of the Nation as a whole under the present profit system can not possibly get enough pay for their work and for their products to be able to buy back with their wages what they have produced.

And yet these producers form the bulk of the buyers of the Nation, since they are in the great majority.

There is always a surplus of products in every civilized country where the wage system prevails that must look for a market elsewhere outside of the country—look for a market any place where the people will buy that surplus production. This means that it must compete in the world market.

Now, that is practically the case with every western European country and with the United States. Of late, also Japan, since Japan has accepted our capitalist system, is competing in the world market.

COMPETITION IS GROWING WORSE

And, remember, this surplus production is growing very rapidly with the improved machinery and as machinery improves. It is getting increasingly harder to get a market anywhere. Markets we must have, however, because under the present economic system we are not producing for use but for sale—producing only for those who can buy.

In other words, while there can be no doubt that workmen and farmers could use all the surplus—or at least most of it—if they had the means with which to buy, our workmen and our farmers can not do so.

Thus the surplus production must look for markets elsewhere. But where?

Every civilized country, or at least every country that is highly developed industrially, is in exactly the same fix.

The English capitalist class and the French capitalist class and the German capitalist class and the Belgian capitalist class, and so forth, all produce more with their improved machinery than they can sell in their own country. They all look for foreign markets.

NO WESTERN NATION WANTS FOREIGN IMPORTS

To a certain extent they could exchange their products, of course. But there is the rub. Most of these countries put up high tariffs. They want no foreign imports to come into their own country, because then they would produce still less, and their own people might be unemployed.

Thus it comes that except for certain products of which this or the other country may have a monopoly for one reason or another, the surplus production must be thrown into the world market, where all compete with each other.

EXPORTS OF LEADING NATIONS VERY LARGE

And every civilized country is continuously on the lookout for new markets; they look for them in Asia, Africa, South America, and wherever there are backward peoples who can not produce these things themselves.

According to official figures, the United States exported in 1927 products to the amount of $4,864,806,000; in 1927 Great Britain exported about $4,160,840,645 worth of products; Germany exported that year about $2,560,144,000; France about $2,197,943,000; and Belgium about one-third of that of France.

MISSIONARIES AS ADVANCE AGENTS

In order to stimulate a demand for their products the business men assist in sending out missionaries to make Christians out of African savages—so as to make them ashamed of going without trousers, or shoes, or hats, or other things of which civilized nations have a surplus.

Not so long ago England even had two wars with China—one from 1839–1842 and another in 1863—because the Chinese Government refused to permit the importation of opium from India to the Chinese Empire. The English won the wars, and the drug that was considered poison in England was poured into China at the rate of 1 ton per hour, 12 hours every day, for some 60 years, until the Chinese revolution brought the traffic to a close.

This is only one aspect of economic imperialism.

MINERALS, TIMBER, RUBBER, AND ESPECIALLY OIL

The other and probably more important side of economic imperialism is the search for raw materials—for oil, metals, rubber, lumber, cotton, wool, and so forth.

Savage and barbaric peoples are in possession of very valuable lands—excellent for agriculture, or covered with wonderful forests, or containing valuable minerals, and, above all, containing oil—oil which has become one of the greatest assets of the present day. Capitalist nations will stop at nothing to get hold of such lands.

"CONCESSIONS," CONTRACTS, AND PLANTATIONS

And there is also still another reason:

In every civilized country the capitalist class is looking for fields to profitably invest the surplus capital of which I have spoken before. And for the simple reason that capital, which is not profitably invested, very soon ceases to be capital.

Thus these capitalists—especially English, French, German, and American capitalists—have been looking around with vigilant eyes for chances to invest their capital as profitably as possible, watch these undeveloped areas, and are eager to make use of them. That is usually done at first by "concessions." These investors get the right or the privilege to build railroads, operate mines or oil wells, to start big ranges, to plant fruit trees, banana trees, start sugar-cane or pineapple plantations, according to the nature of the country.

Our President elect, Herbert Hoover, could tell us quite a little about that.

INVESTMENTS IN BACKWARD COUNTRIES ARE VERY ATTRACTIVE

Thus we have three sources of imperialism. One is the continued profitable disposal of the huge output of surplus commodities of all industrially developed nations. The other is the necessity of commanding the sources of supply of the raw materials for these industries. The third is to invest money profitably in undertakings outside of one's own country.

To say more about this last:

When capital has accumulated in large fortunes, when the rate of interest is beginning to fall at home, then the capitalists discover that there are many uncivilized races—or even races that have a very ancient civilization—that are weak and can not defend themselves, all of whom can be more easily exploited than their fellow citizens at home, who are apt to resist, if the screws are put on too hard. Thus the export of capital to such countries becomes much more attractive to the profit-making capitalists than its use for the extension of manufacturing facilities at home.

Now, if the adage is true that trade follows the flag—then the flag must also follow the investor and protect him. It must also follow the financier and the money lender and protect him.

WHY A WARLIKE FRONT IS NECESSARY

Because there is also this:

These backward peoples have a moral code of their own, and they do not enter willingly into lasting business relations with civilized men.

Our business men will tell you that it is therefore necessary for the purposes of trade and culture that these backward nations, or ancient nations, be compelled to live up to such rules of conduct as will make trade possible and lucrative for the civilized white men who have invested their money.

To this end, cruisers, marines—and an army and navy—are indispensable.

A warlike front becomes absolutely necessary all the time. Armaments and warlike demonstrations have become part of the regular apparatus of business, so far as business is concerned with the world market.

THE CHANGE IN THE BRITISH VIEW

At first only peaceable, economic penetration is the rule.

The classic land to study all this is Great Britain.

We find, for instance, that as long as Great Britain had a natural monopoly of the raw materials and of the markets of the world, British manufacturers and merchants were rather indifferent as to the growth of the British Empire. There were some British economists and politicians who regarded most of their colonies as rather useless encumbrances, involving an expense upon the British taxpayers.

With the increasing competition, however, and with the entry of the manufacturers and merchants of the United States, and of Germany, and even of Japan, into the world market, the British point of view changed.

JOHN BRIGHT AND JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN

Thus, for instance, John Bright, cotton manufacturer in Manchester, in the middle of the nineteenth century—a period when British cotton goods had the undisputed control of the markets both in England and abroad—was a pronounced pacifist. John Bright was also a convinced free trader and an antimilitarist and a radical leader.

But Joseph Chamberlain, of Birmingham (the father of Sir Austen Chamberlain, the present Foreign Secretary of England), Bright's successor in the leadership of the radicals, 50 years later was just as convinced that pacifism was a fallacy and he was willing to consider a high tariff.

He said:

> The empire is commerce. It was created by commerce, it is founded upon commerce, and it could not exist a day without commerce. For these reasons, among others, I would never lose the hold which we now have over our great Indian dependency—by far the greatest and most valuable of all the customers we have or shall ever have for England. For the same reasons I approve of the continued occupation of Egypt; and for the same reasons I have urged upon the British Government the necessity of using every legitimate opportunity to extend our influence in that great African continent which is now being opened up to civilization and commerce; and lastly, it is for the same reasons that I hold that our navy should be strengthened until its supremacy is so assured that we can not be shaken in any of the possessions which we hold or may ever hold hereafter.

That speech was made in 1897.

LORD MILNER ASCRIBED PROSPERITY TO MILITARY AND NAVAL STRENGTH

This powerful but crude imperalism of the leading British statesmen of that time was reinforced by the more polished utterances of others. For instance, by Lord Milner, who, together with Cecil Rhodes, was largely responsible for the Boer War. Lord Milner said in an address to the Manchester Conservative Club in 1906:

> You can not have prosperity without power. We Britons of all people depend for our very life not on the products of these islands alone but on world enterprise and commerce. This country must remain a great power or she will become a poor country * * *. But greatness is relative; physical limitations alone forbid that these islands by themselves should retain the same relative importance among the vast empires of the modern world which they held in the days of the smaller states—which England held before the growth of Russia and of the United States—which England held before united Germany made those giant strides in prosperity and commerce, which have been the direct result of the development of military and naval strength.

And, as a matter of fact, we all know that when in the first six months of 1914 German world trade became as large as the British the World War did not delay.

WAR BETWEEN GERMANY AND ENGLAND WAS QUITE "UNTHINKABLE"

The World War did not delay, although in July, 1914, when the German ambassador, Prince Lichnowsky, had his last interview with the Prime Minister of England, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Asquith told him that a war with Germany was "quite unthinkable." War was then on the point of just breaking out. It was "unthinkable," but it was just going to take place.

I am saying all this in order to warn this House and the country in general, because the rivalry between Great Britain and America has grown during the last two or three years with a speed that is simply uncanny.

WAR BETWEEN ENGLAND AND AMERICA IS NOW UNTHINKABLE

Now, this is the economic situation. How about the political? We find now that two years ago war between Great Britain and the United States was undreamed of. A year ago we were told it was "unthinkable." Which simply meant that many people had come to think about it. And now any student of history and political economy will tell you that an enduring peace is unthinkable if capitalism is to last.

Let us follow mainly English sources, if for no other reason than that we do not wish to be accused of any anti-British bias.

AMERICA IS NOT WORKING FOR COLONIES

And this is the English view: The English simply claim that American business is developing with speed a new policy of imperialism on a large scale.

This imperialism is developing on somewhat different lines than the old European imperialism, which was usually followed by colonizing and acquiring new territory. America wants no colonies, and desires no actual annexation of new territory, except in cases of absolute necessity, like, for instance, in Panama, for the canal.

American business is simply trying peaceful penetration—seeking investments in great new areas of the world; seeking new markets.

This is called peaceful economic penetration.

Of course, some will say that the United States took Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, and we have troops in Haiti and Nicaragua. But these are mostly accidents, although if another canal is built, America is apt to make sure of Nicaragua. The fact is, however, that in the rest of the world our business men, financiers, are not seeking any military conquests, but simply concessions, contracts, and markets.

But that is just the trouble.

"BROTHER JONATHAN" IS AT A DISADVANTAGE

To begin with, Uncle Sam, our "Brother Jonathan," as they call him in Europe, comes late. The world is already taken. The greatest and richest of all areas belong to Great Britain.

The Americans who desire to compete there, or to make investments, if they are permitted to compete at all or to invest at all, must do so at an enormous disadvantage.

Throughout the British Empire, for example, Americans are not granted, as a rule, the right to prospect or to bore for oil wells, or to operate them, to mention only one thing.

Nor is this all.

LOOK TO "UNCLE SAM" TO PROTECT THEM

The world over, in Asia, in Africa—from China to Peru—Americans and Englishmen are competing fiercely for the exploitation of great undeveloped national resources in the so-called backward countries. And these prospectors and investors naturally look to their respective governments to support them. They say that a government is not here just for the purpose of receiving taxes and customhouse duties, but the government is also here to protect its citizens when they do business.

Is it surprising, then, that these two governments soon find themselves in strong antagonism?

WHEN GERMANY WAS LOOKING FOR A PLACE IN THE SUN

The situation reminds one very closely of German economic penetration of the world before the World War. The underlying principle is exactly the same.

Germany had grown immensely strong economically and had a population larger than the agriculture of the country could support. Germany then naturally became a manufacturing country and was trying to procure her share in the world's markets. Germany was looking "for a place in the sun," where she could do business not by toleration or the good grace of England, but by her own right.

An aggressive and expansive policy followed, and England started as early as 1903 to "encircle" Germany by her enemies.

SEA POWER WAS ALWAYS THE DECIDING FACTOR

The causes creating American imperialism are the same. The United States to-day is by far the richest and strongest economic power in the world. Our business men, financiers, and trusts want to conquer the world market, or at least get a big share of it, and, as the figures prove, they are making rapid headway.

And there you are. What can be done about it?

So far in history sea power was the deciding factor in these matters.

WHO IS TO BE NEXT?

Great Britain has so far been very successful in destroying its competitors for the world market. Great Britain has annihilated the sea power of Spain, France, Holland, and Germany.

Whose sea power will Great Britain try to annihilate next?

MR. COOLIDGE THINKS WE ARE ENTITLED TO A LARGER NUMBER OF SHIPS

And President Coolidge expressed the American point of view very clearly in his last Armistice Day speech when he said:

We have not only a long coast line, distant outlying possessions, but also a foreign commerce unsurpassed in importance, and foreign investments unsurpassed in amount. Not only must our people and our treasure be protected but we are also bound by international treaties to defend the Panama Canal. Having few fueling stations, we require ships of large tonnage; and having scarcely any merchant vessels capable of mounting 5 or 6 inch guns, it is obvious that, based upon positions, we are entitled to a larger number of warships than a nation having all of these advantages.

And he added:

If we could secure a more complete reciprocity in good will toward the final liquidation of the balance of our foreign debts, and such further limitations of armament as would be commensurate with the treaty renouncing war, our confidence in the effectiveness of any additional efforts on our part to assist in the further progress of Europe would be greatly increased.

BIRKENHEAD TELLING COOLIDGE "WHAT'S WHAT"

But this speech of Mr. Coolidge drew its counterpart a few days later from Lord Birkenhead, probably the ablest and most astute member of the British Tory cabinet. The noble lord said, in substance:

They had a few days ago a speech by the President of the United States in the direction of advice to the European countries. So far as England is concerned, Birkenhead was sure that England did not especially require any advice. England had not asked the United States, so far as he was aware, to do anything for her. When America went into the war it was because American nationals were being murdered by German submarines. That was the only reason. And while the Allies appreciated the immense contribution that the United States made and the moral effect it had on Germany and her allies, they also remember that a million Englishmen were killed and 1,500,000 Frenchmen, and that the American soldiers were carried in English ships.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Did they not get a very handsome remuneration for every soldier that they carried for this Government?

AND BOTTOMLEY TELLING THINGS "HERE AND NOW"

Mr. BERGER. They did. And the well-known English jingo, Mr. Bottomley, developed this English version further by writing:

The truth is, America has no genuine sympathy with Europe and is jealous of and antagonistic to Britain.

America does not care a damn either for an American-Anglo union or for the prosperity of the Anglo-Saxon race, or, for that matter, for the peace of the world. War is the breath of her nostrils. It means filling her coffers with European gold, and the creation of an ever-increasing army of bloated millionaires—increasing, by the way, at the rate of 50 a year.

I have a nasty knack of saying things which others only think. And in American jargon I declare "here and now" that America has her eye on Canada, whom she is gradually getting into her power by the peaceful penetration of loans and financial control. * * * It is time to speak plainly, and I think self-preservation and common sense dictate not only an Anglo-French naval understanding but a European pact of peace—yes; with Germany included—against that iced-water drinking continent whose hypocritical prohibition farce our own fanatical teetotalers are threatening to make a cry at the general election.

Thus Mr. Bottomley.

BOTTOMLEY EVEN WANTS THE "GERMHUNS" IN THE ALLIANCE

English Socialists call attention to the striking similarity of these expressions with those made public for a few years before the outbreak of the World War—then pertaining to Great Britain and Germany. These Socialists declare that the condition is alarming.

And not less striking nor less alarming is the fact that Mr. Bottomley—who but a year or two ago was clamoring for the destruction of all "Germhuns, like so much vermin"—now urges an alliance with those vermin against English-speaking America.

So much from these quarters.

SHYLOCK? THAT IS "UNCLE SAM" IN ENGLISH

Nevertheless, the far-famed dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in London—Mr. Inge, called the gloomy dean—recently also said that in a certain contingency:

It is more than possible that the nations of Europe, enraged by the bloated prosperity and airs of superiority of "the man who won the war" would combine to draw Shylock's teeth.

You know, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that Shylock is the pet name by which Uncle Sam is affectionately known in France and England.

"FREEDOM OF THE SEAS" IS THE ONLY VALUE WE CAN GET

Even more alarming as a feature of foreign relations to-day is the British tendency to treat the American challenge to English sea power and commercial supremacy as England treated that of Germany.

The English Government ignores the fact that Americans are only aiming at freedom of the sea—at least at present. After all, freedom of the sea is the only valuable achievement America could get out of the World War in return for her entry. And having failed to do so, it is not surprising for anybody familiar with the necessity of foreign trade under our system that America now intends to get freedom of the sea if necessary by building a fleet that will take command of the sea.

There is also this: If America should make up her mind to do so, it will be done. England can not stop us. England can not outbuild us. And England can not outbluff us.

TORY CABINET SHOWED BAD FAITH

By the Washington treaty of 1922, England accepted—as everybody supposed—the principle of parity with America in building warships. This would in time establish a new international sea law on the basis of one of Wilson's 14 points, "Freedom of navigation on the seas, alike in peace and in war, except as they may be closed by international action."

The failure of the Geneva conference—1927—to extend parity for battleships and cruisers was really due to the British Tory government trying to get around this by retaining the command of the sea through cruisers—since the battleships are obsolete, anyhow.

Now, I believe that cruisers are also of doubtful value, with airplanes and submarines coming into play. Nevertheless, the action of the British Government trying to sneak such an advantage in naval armaments showed bad faith and also proved that Great Britain can not be trusted. All fair-minded Englishmen admit this.

Nor is this all.

THE FRANCO-BRITISH PACT AGAINST AMERICA

With all this, and on top of it, last fall came the so-called Franco-British pact. M. Aristide Briand and Sir Austen Chamberlain were supposed to have removed the deadlock between England and France as to naval disarmament—the English having always opposed the unlimited building of submarines by France.

But how did they remove this deadlock?

This was at first a secret. But the Hearst press in America got a copy of the circular of the French Government sent to its representatives everywhere—that contained the terms of the agreement.

It was thereby established that the naval compromise was not a compromise at all but was, in fact, a combination of British and French requirements as to naval armament—surely not of disarmament.

The large cruisers required by America—partly for strategic reasons and partly as a "club" to force disarmament upon the others—were to be limited. So much for America.

But the smaller cruisers wanted by the British for their far-flung domains and the submarines wanted by the French for commerce destruction were to remain unlimited. And this, although the policy of America and the antiwar sentiment of the whole world demanded the limitation of all warships. And Coolidge and Kellogg deserve credit for expressing this sentiment.

THE FRANCO-BRITISH PACT AGAINST GERMANY

And if the Anglo-French pact was, therefore, bad enough in respect to its naval provisions—the rest was much worse.

The French let it be known jubilantly that one of their conditions, and one of the British concessions, was the British acceptance of the French demand that the trained reserves of their army, numbering many hundred thousands, must not be taken into account in military disarmament. But to allow France to have all the military reserves she wants, without counting them at all—and yet to forbid conscription to Germany—simply meant to make permanent the French overlordship of Europe.

FRENCH PRESS BOASTED OF ALLIANCE AGAINST AMERICA AND GERMANY

No wonder that the French press openly boasted of an armed alliance with Great Britain against Germany on land and America at sea.

The publication of that pact aroused public opinion everywhere, however.

The American press almost unanimously denounced an Anglo-French naval alliance that destroyed the principle of parity, and made "a scrap of paper" of the treaty of Washington of 1922.

The Berlin press declared that Locarno was dead.

The Italian press announced that the British had arranged for the transfer of the French submarines and airplanes to the Mediterranean.

ENGLISH PUBLIC OPINION CONDEMNED THE PACT

Fortunately, the British public also got alarmed. Englishmen remembered how the liaisons had, as an "obligation of honor," carried England to war in 1914—although the very existence of these agreements had been denied in Parliament by the premier and foreign secretary at that time.

Even the Tory press was emphatic in its condemnation of the English Government's policy.

The government tried to explain and deny.

ENGLISH REASONS AGAINST THE PACT

But there were the facts. Was not the principles of the new entente—the exclusion of trained reserves from disarmament, and the coupling of Rhineland evacuation with reparations and revision—a departure from the approved principles of British policy?

Was not the French air power twice as large as the English? Was not the French submarine fleet a menace to British commerce compared with which the German submarines in the World War were insignificant?

Was not the naval compromise a challenge to America—and the trained concession a menace to Germany—which only an armed alliance could risk?

Had not "conversations" taken place between British admirals and air marshals and their French opposite numbers, and were not their names and the nature of their arrangements known?

This crushing criticism put the British Government into a serious situation, especially since all of this happened shortly before the opening of Parliament.

KELLOGG SAVED THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT

From this predicament the British Government was saved by Washington.

Our Government, without waiting for the publication of the original note, issued its own reply to the press. The general tone was rather stiff, and the conclusion was a short rejection of the Franco-British pact. To this rejection, however, was tendered the suggestion that an agreement might be sought along the line of making the categories flexible, so that a power might increase construction on the one by reducing on the other.

This example was followed by the Italians, whose reply was also a refusal. The Japanese accepted. But that mattered little. For Great Britain, Japan, and America, if necessity required, could impose disarmament procedure upon France, but Great Britain, Japan, and France can not possibly impose either armament or disarmament on America.

ALL THE WORLD BELIEVES IT IS DEAD

The British Government therefore admitted from the start that an American rejection would be fatal.

And the publication of the pact (on October 23, 1928) finished it—at least the world so believes. It was not even mentioned a few weeks later in the King's speech at the opening of the Parliament.

What now?

BRITISH NOW WILLING TO OPEN NEGOTIATIONS LATER

The American Congress has passed a bill to build 15 cruisers within the next three years, and the President has signed the bill. If America really wants to challenge British supremacy on the sea, 15 cruisers are not enough, of course. And our big-navy men really asked for 71 warships. Nevertheless, it is a gesture, a hint with a club, since Great Britain knows that America could not only build 71 but 150 vessels if she made up her mind to do so.

The British ambassador seemed to understand that, and he hastened to declare in the press that England is ready for another conference; but he was promptly repudiated by his Government. The British Foreign Office at first bluntly and officially denied any immediate intention to communicate with the United States in the matter of naval disarmament. Later, however, the British Foreign Office signified its willingness to open negotiations again after having consulted with the various British dominions.

And this is how the matter stands up to date.

ENGLISH CLAIM OF SEA RULE AS SOUND AGAINST AMERICA AS AGAINST GERMANY

Let us review the situation, then, in a few words.

What is taking place between Great Britain and America is almost exactly what took place as between Britain and Germany in the decade that preceded the war.

Germany set out to build a navy. Britain claimed that her national life depended upon her predominant sea power, and proceeded to meet it with more power—and with alliances and with the so-called entente. Out of that competition and these alliances came the war.

America has made it plain that she intends to possess a navy as big and as able as that of Great Britain, and that if Great Britain does not disarm, or reduce her navy, America would proceed to build. The Anglo-American situation may not duplicate in every detail the Anglo-German—because we have neither France nor Russia as neighbors, and Germany has both—but the underlying fact of competition, although both the Governments of Great Britain and America deny it, is nevertheless identical.

And if the assumption that "Britannia must rule the waves"—that England must predominate on the seven seas—was sound and correct in its quarrel with Germany it must also be considered to hold good against the United States.

ENGLAND WANTS COMPLETE MASTERY OF THE SEA IN WAR TIME

Moreover, America has had serious troubles—and once even a war—with England on that account.

The United States held on to its theory of sea right as a policy of national security and international justice, and it holds to this theory just as definitely and strictly as Great Britain holds to hers. Only the American theory of rights at sea happens to be in irreconcilable conflict with the British theory of sea rights.

To put it in as few words as possible it is this:

America claims the right, whether Britain is at war or not—to trade with neutrals unhampered by any British restrictions.

Great Britain says in effect that such trade with neutrals shall be subject to her command of the sea in war time—to her right to decide whether this or that cargo might not in the end go to Britain's enemy. And England claims the right to be the sole judge in every instance.

BUT AMERICA WILL NOT ABANDON ANY PRIMITIVE RIGHTS

America challenges this English version of sea rights. In fact, has always done so, except in this last war, when we were in the war ourselves as English allies.

America has stood up for the protection of her trade consistently since she has become an independent country. She did so when the country was young and weak, and since she has now become the richest and most powerful Nation on earth she will most assuredly not abandon these primitive rights.

Let us take a concrete example as given in Foreign Affairs, an English monthly:

WHAT WOULD HAPPEN TO THAT SHIPLOAD

Britain is at war with France or Germany, for instance.

An American merchant receives an order for a shipload of cotton, or lard, or foodstuffs from a Dutch merchant. This American cargo is shipped in an American or Dutch or Italian vessel. America is at peace with England, at peace with Holland, at peace with Italy, at peace with England's enemy, at peace with all the world. But that ship is stopped by a British cruiser, taken into a British port, and a British court deciding that the American cargo is ultimately intended for Britain's enemy—or may get there—condemns and seizes the cargo. Neither the American nor the Holland nor the Italian parties are represented on the bench of that court. It is purely an ex parte decision.

TWO OPPOSITE DOCTRINES

Now the Americans say:

Our whole foreign commerce, our right to trade with nations with which we are at peace, can at any moment be forbidden by a foreign government, the British—whenever Britain chooses to go to war. Our right of movement in the world is subject to the will of England.

And Americans say further:

We intend to vindicate our right to the freedom of the sea and if necessary for that purpose, we shall have a navy so powerful that our rights will be respected even by Great Britain.

The case from the American point of view seems to be very strong.

On the other hand, however, the British claim:

To surrender the right to search and capture neutral ships would be to surrender the most powerful weapon which we have. Without a blockade exercised in just such a way, Germany could never have been defeated by us.

This is sound logic from a British point of view. But it is based on brutal force and valid only so long as all the other powers submit—or are not strong enough—to offer resistance.

Otherwise, they might say that it is not God ordained and not even a part of the Ten Commandments that Great Britain must win every war. As far as is known in history she lost one war against her own colonies in the eighteenth century.

EVEN THE NEW YORK WORLD THINKS BRITISH CLAIM IMPOSSIBLE

And even the New York World, which is extremely friendly to England, said recently:

> The British Admiralty and a part of the British Nation still holds fast to the claim that Great Britain shall have the power to say who shall and who shall not sail the sea in ships. It is a claim which would put the interest of all other nations in jeopardy whenever Great Britain is at war. It is an impossible claim, for it amounts to saying that the interest of mankind upon the seas shall in law and in fact be subject to the British Admiralty.

This is the situation up to date, Mr. Speaker. And if we look at it from the well-established historical and economic point of view it holds out little or no promise for a better future.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WHAT MAY HAPPEN

Mr. BERGER. We undoubtedly will have more conferences and more agreements and disagreements about armament and disarmament. And it will be proven again and again in the future, as in the past, that our American diplomacy is no match for the British; that they will get the best of our so-called diplomats often in the future as they did get the best of Wilson in Paris in 1919 and of Hughes in 1922. And then will follow accusations and counteraccusations. They will speak of "perfidious Albion" and of the "shirt-sleeve" diplomacy of the United States—and relations will go from bad to worse.

If the Tory viewpoint is to prevail in England, that country will undoubtedly seek and complete all sorts of alliances to perpetuate the mastery of the English rule at sea and, closely connected with it, the restitution of Great Britain's preponderance in the world's markets.

TO SAFEGUARD BUSINESS?

At the bottom of the question, after all, is the question of the world market, of which the "rule of the sea" is only a part, although undoubtedly an important part.

And what is to be the outcome of it all? A war between England and the United States? Why, and what for? To secure the safety of business? Why should millions of lives be sacrificed, apart from the billions of property that would be destroyed, simply to safeguard business?

WHAT A WAR WOULD MEAN IN THE FUTURE

The World War cost 30,000,000 lives and $400,000,000,000 worth of property. And the next war—which, by its very nature, would be a world war again—would cost infinitely more. It may mean the end of our present civilization, the wind-up of the white race. The next war, if there is to be one, will be fought out along entirely different lines than the last, which was mainly a war of mud, vermin, disease, and nameless agony.

The next war will be mainly a war of airplanes, of submarines, and of chemicals. Cruisers, no matter how many we may build, will be obsolete within the next 10 or 15 years. A cruiser will be no match either for the airplane or the submarine.

As science is developing now, and especially chemical science, airplanes will have it in their power to throw bombs from the air, not only filled with molten metal spray but also with deadly gases that will spread death caused by suffocation from contraction of the throat, from congestion of the lungs, or by absorption of poison into the blood through the lungs. The populations of entire cities may thus be destroyed within a few minutes, and every living being, men, women, and children, destroyed.

Is the world market worth all of this?

THERE ARE SOME THINGS WORSE THAN WAR

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want it to be understood that I am not a pacifist in the sense that I am a nonresistant. There are worse things even than war, and worse things than death. Slavery, for instance, to my mind, is worse than either war or death. I would rather see my children and grandchildren dead than slaves.

And if this country of ours should actually be attacked, actually invaded, I would consider it the duty of every man, and woman for that matter, to defend their homes and their families, and I consider a certain amount of preparedness for that emergency justifiable. So much, but no more.

WE WANT NO WORLD CATASTROPHE TO SAFEGUARD PROFITS

I can not get enthused, however, about going to war for world markets or for the investments of Mr. Morgan, Mr. Rockefeller, or anybody else. These gentlemen go into other countries to make investments and they do so in order to make profits. And they should be willing to take a reasonable amount of business risk or stay away.

As for the seas, they are the world's highway and naturally ought to be as free and as secure as any other highway. And I am quite sure that a great proportion of the British population—all the millions that are with the Labor Party, and a large share of the Liberals—are now accepting this point of view.

The reactionaries and "die-hards" have brought England to the sorry plight in which she finds herself now. And from my personal acquaintance with the leading Socialist statesmen of England—who undoubtedly will take the reins within a short time—I am sure that a "modus vivendi" will be found without any recourse to arms that would mean a catastrophe—a catastrophe to England and to Europe as well. And what would be left of Europe after the catastrophe, would become communist, as a matter of course.

Several suggestions could be made.

SCRAP ALL PACTS DICTATED BY WAR, HATRED, AND HELL

One would be this:

Let the representatives of all the civilized nations of the world be assembled in a great conference for the purpose of undoing, as far as possible, the evils of the World War, and to prevent its repetition, scrap the pact of Versailles, and of all other pacts dictated by war, hatred, and hell.

Wipe out all the economic obstacles, border lines, and tariffs all over Europe. Have absolute free exchange of production in Europe. Take in Russia also, if Russia is willing to come.

America is a continent and a world of its own. And if America troubles Europe by an eccentric high tariff—let a united Europe put up the same kind of a tariff against America. We are bright, and we will soon learn.

Have an international congress with well-understood and closely defined legislative powers over international affairs, and establish a genuine international court to construe these international laws. America ought to join in that.

FREEDOM OF THE SEA AND INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF WATERWAYS

Appoint special commissions of neutrals to consider international disputes as they may arise, such decisions to be enforced, if necessary, by economic pressure, without resort to arms. Have international control of strategic waterways, such as the Dardanelles, the Strait of Gibraltar, and also of the Suez, Kiel, and Panama Canals.

Have absolute neutrality and freedom of the "seven seas." Divide up the colonies among the great European nations. We do not need any.

DISARMAMENT AND EMBARGO ON FOOD AND WAR MATERIAL

In order to make all of this possible there must be as complete and universal disarmament as necessary. And it ought to be brought about as speedily as possible.

And by all means let us have absolute prohibition of exportation of arms, war equipment, and food supplies for war purposes from one country to another.

SCIENCE WILL PROBABLY SOLVE MOST OF THESE QUESTIONS

Mr. Speaker, some of these propositions may look Utopian, but they are not. All of them are practicable and will eventually have to be put into force. If these steps are taken there can be no doubt that wars will be a thing of the past—at least within the white race—and a war with England would really be unthinkable.

But, above all, I trust that science, which now makes wars more horrible, will eventually make them impossible and unnecessary by solving the question of food and raw materials, while cooperation and progress in social science will solve the question of distribution and all other questions.

And this is part of the mission of the international socialist movement. [Applause.]

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 15712, the War Department appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what did the conferees do about the Sackett amendment?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, the conferees have arranged that, I think, in a manner that will be entirely satisfactory, limiting it to $50,000.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is there a lawyer's limitation in that, so far as the fee is concerned?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; $5,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

On No. 56, relating to flood-control work on the Missouri River at and near the town of Yankton, S. Dak.

On No. 57, relating to levee reconstruction in Conway levee district No. 1, Conway County, Ark.

On No. 58, relating to a survey of the Conduit Road from the District of Columbia line to Great Falls, Md.

On No. 59, relating to payment to John W. Stockett.

HENRY E. BARBOUR,
FRANK CLAGUE,
JOHN TABER,
T. W. HARRISON,
ROSS A. COLLINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, unless there are some questions to be asked, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have one or two questions I desire to ask. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I notice that the amendment No. 11 knocked out my amendment reducing the reward for the delivery of deserters from $50 to $25.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have been looking at that situation for a long time and have studied it very carefully. My amendment was the result of the facts as I learned them, the abuse that has grown up, constituting a regular system of private detectives enticing these young men to desert, and then, after these men have deserted, catching them and delivering them in order to get the reward. I realize that I am helpless in the matter. The conferees have agreed to restore the $50 reward. All I can do is to do as I have been doing for the last 12 years, and that is to carry on the fight and renew it next year. Perhaps in 10 years from now the committee will be convinced.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the situation which the gentleman describes exists generally. It may exist in certain places, but this provides for the return of deserters and paying the same amount that has always been paid. It is true the gentleman's amendment was adopted in the House, reducing the amount to $25. The Senate restored it to $50, and the conferees agreed to accept that Senate amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What did the conferees do with my Liberty motor amendment?

Mr. BARBOUR. I think that we improved that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is something at least. It does not destroy the intent that planes ordered after July 1, 1929, with the money appropriated in this bill can not be equipped with Liberty motors or motors constructed on a design used prior to 1920.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is correct. No planes ordered with the money appropriated in this bill may be equipped with Liberty motors or with motors built before July 1, 1920.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That carries out the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. What was done with the amendment relating to the survey of the Conduit Road by the Engineer Corps of the Army?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is an amendment that had to be brought back to the House. We have brought it back in technical disagreement. The conferees have agreed among themselves on the survey but have reduced the amount from $4,800 to $3,000, and we are going to ask the House to approve that action.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What is done with reference to the National Guard?

Mr. BARBOUR. There were some increases for the National Guard.

Mr. ABERNETHY. To what extent?

Mr. BARBOUR. Three hundred thousand dollars, $100,000 for caretakers, $150,000 for new camp construction at training camps, and $50,000 additional for maintenance at training camps. These amounts are all in addition to the amounts carried in the House bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. In other words, the conferees conceded in conference what was denied in the House.

Mr. BARBOUR. No; the gentleman is wrong on that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 16: Page 23, line 17, strike out the words "the transportation of" and insert "transporting children of Army personnel to and from school, and."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 28: Page 47, line 20, insert "Constructing quartermaster in addition to his regular pay, $1,000;".

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. What reason is there to pay this officer more than the law fixes as his pay? Why should one officer of the Army be taken up and favored in this manner?

Mr. BARBOUR. This has been done for a good many years. This particular officer has drawn the $1,000 additional. It is intended to be in compensation for exceptional services that he renders as superintendent of construction at West Point, upon the ground that he has been able to save the Government considerable money. That is the reason for this additional compensation.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I realize, of course, that the amendment will be adopted, but while the amount of money is not large, it seems to me to be a bad precedent, and the subcommittee on the Army appropriation bill in the next appropriation bill ought to see to it that it is discontinued.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that this item was not in the House bill. The precedent is not established by this bill. It was established some years ago.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I realize that it has been in the bill heretofore, but it is time that that discrimination was removed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I could speak very feelingly on this amendment. I do not believe that the gentleman in question is going to stay up at West Point very much longer, so that there may be no necessity for this item next year. This man has saved money in the construction at West Point. A mason receives $14 in New York City, and at West Point he receives $8. A laborer or helper in New York City receives $8, and at West Point $4. That is the kind of saving that has been made. I have reasonable assurance that a squib will be put under this man. The men have had their wages kept down so low that they can not support their families.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 29: Page 47 of the bill, line 23, strike out "$49,830" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,830."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 41: Page 56, line 16, strike out "$1,656,351" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,396,561."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment. The amendment is at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "$2,147,281, and in addition thereto there is hereby made available for this purpose the sum of $224,750 of funds received during the fiscal year 1930 from the purchase by enlisted men of the Army of theier discharges, and the total sum made available in this act for the Organized Reserves shall remain available until December 31, 1930, and no part of such total sum shall be available for any expense incident to giving flight training to any officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps who shall be found by such agency as the Secretary of War may designate not qualified to perform combat service as an aviation pilot.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California moves to recede and concur with an amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 52: Page 78, at the top of the page, insert: "Old Fort Niagara, N. Y.: For repair, restoration, and rehabilitation of the two blockhouses, the bakehouse, the magazine, and the French barracks, at Old Fort Niagara, N. Y., including construction of a rest room adjacent to the 'castle,' and the restoration and construction of the old French drawbridge, $25,000, to be expended only when matched by an equal amount by donation from local interests for the same purpose, which amount the Secretary of War is authorized to expend."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California moves to recede and concur with an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$25,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$15,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from California.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 54: Page 80 of the bill, in line 7, insert "and to include $1,000 compensation to the president of the Board of Road Commissioners of Alaska, in addition to his regular pay and allowances."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman will probably recall that a few days ago the House passed a bill prohibiting a Federal officer from accepting any additional pay from the Legislature of Alaska. In view of the fact that we have, very properly, I think, legislated to that effect. I am wondering why the Committee on Appropriations should agree to any amendment that gives this officer an additional amount to that which he receives under the general law.

Mr. BARBOUR. This officer draws all of his pay from the Federal Government, none of it being paid by the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. That is true, but this officer draws compensation as president of the road commission, as I understand.

Mr. BARBOUR. This officer is a United States Army engineer, and, as I understand, always has been. This is another precedent established a number of years ago, due to the fact that this particular officer has a very difficult task to perform. He is in charge of all the roads, trails, and bridges in the Territory of Alaska and has to travel under most unfavorable circumstances to all parts of that sparsely settled Territory, and Congress a few years ago thought it would be no more than just to give him $1,000 more.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Has this been carried heretofore?

Mr. BARBOUR. It has; yes. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that this is the first time this particular officer will receive additional compensation. It was carried for former officers, but Major Elliott, who is now the president of this board, assumed that office a year ago and it was not allowed him for last year, but this is his second year in that position and we are allowing it for him this year. His predecessors in office have all received this extra $1,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 55: Page 81, after line 8, insert: "For bank protection for the control of floods and the prevention of erosion of the Missouri River at and near the town of Niobrara in the State of Nebraska, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; said work to be carried on under the control and supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department: Provided, That the local interests shall contribute one-third of the cost of the said work."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. The amount named in the Senate amendment is the same as named in a Senate bill passed a year ago, is it not?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am not familiar with that Senate bill.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I think it was. The bill came over here late in May of last year and we had no time to get it before the Flood Control Committee. The Speaker regarded it as a matter so emergent that he granted me permission to call it up but it was objected to on the ground of establishing a bad precedent. I very much regret that the chairman has seen fit to reduce the amount so alarmingly, but I know I stand in an attitude where I must take this or take nothing, and I take what I can get.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"For bank protection for the control of floods and the prevention of erosion of the Missouri River at and near the town of Niobrara in the State of Nebraska, $85,000, said work to be carried on under the control and supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department: Provided, That the local interests shall contribute two-thirds of the cost of said work."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 56: Page 81, after line 16, insert: "That there is appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for bank protection for the control of floods and the prevention of erosion of the Missouri River at and near the town of Yankton in the State of South Dakota; said work to be carried on under the control and supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department: Provided, That the local interests shall contribute one-third of the cost of the said work."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"For bank protection for the control of floods and the prevention of erosion of the Missouri River at and near the town of Yankton in the State of South Dakota, $85,000, said work to be carried on under the control and supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department: Provided, That the local interests shall contribute two-thirds of the cost of said work."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 57: Page 82, beginning in line 1, insert:

"That in the reconstruction of the levee along the left bank of the Arkansas River in Conway levee district No. 1, Conway County, Ark., as provided under the terms of section 7 of the flood control act (Public, No. 391), approved May 15, 1928, authority is hereby granted to the Secretary of War, upon the recommendation and approval of the Chief of Engineers, to relocate all or any part of said levee when in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers such relocation shall be deemed practical and feasible."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That as a contribution in aid from the United States, in view of the unprecedented conditions obtaining in Conway levee district No. 1, Conway County, Ark., in the reconstruction of the levee along the left bank of the Arkansas River in the said Conway levee district No. 1, as provided under the terms of section 7 of the flood control act, approved May 15, 1928 (45 Stat. 537), authority is hereby granted to the Secretary of War, upon the recommendation and approval of the Chief of Engineers, to relocate all or any part of said levee when in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers such relocation shall be deemed practical and feasible: Provided, That the total expense occasioned to the United States by reason of the provisions of this paragraph shall not exceed $20,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 58, on page 83, beginning in line 1, insert:

"That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, is authorized and directed to make an examination and survey of the Conduit Road from the District of Columbia line to Great Falls, Md., of Cabin John Bridge, and of land contiguous to that part of such road and to such bridge, for the purpose of making recommendations for improving and widening that part of such road and such bridge, and, upon the completion of such examination and survey, to report to Congress the results thereof, together with estimates of the probable cost of carrying out such recommendations. There is hereby appropriated the sum of $4,800, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this paragraph."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, is authorized and directed to make an examination and survey of the Conduit Road from the District of Columbia line to Great Falls, Md., of Cabin John Bridge, and of land contiguous to that part of such road and to such bridge, for the purpose of making recommendations for improving and widening that part of such road and such bridge, and, upon the completion of such examination and survey, to report to Congress the results thereof, together with estimates of the probable cost of carrying out such recommendations, and together also with recommendations as to the amount, if any, which justly should be advanced therefor by the Government of the United States. There is hereby appropriated the sum of $3,000 to carry out the provisions of this paragraph."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 59, page 84, after line 20, insert:

"ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT

"For the payment to John W. Stockett the sum of $142,500 on account of the use by the United States of the patent device of the said John W. Stockett for breech firing mechanism."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Upon the filing with the Comptroller General of the United States of evidence establishing to his satisfaction that John W. Stockett has been released by the other party thereto of all claims and demands whatsoever under a certain agreement dated April 11, 1927, and expressly released of the obligation as therein stipulated for the payment of 40 per cent of the amount involved for assistance and expenses in securing compensation from the United States, the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for the payment as hereinafter specified in full settlement of all claims and demands whatsoever arising out of the use by the United States of the Stockett priming device and/or the Stockett breech mechanism on guns, and thereupon there shall be paid under this appropriation the sum of $45,000 to the said John W. Stockett, and the sum of $5,000 shall be paid to and retained by the other party to said agreement as compensation for his services: Provided, That if the evidence of release aforesaid is not filed with the Comptroller General of the United States upon his request within the time specified by him this appropriation shall lapse and revert back to the Treasury and be as if no appropriation had been made."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter in which the House is very much interested. To make it perfectly clear, this amendment provides for the payment of $50,000, of which $45,000 goes to the said John W. Stockett and $5,000 is to be paid to his attorney?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that will settle it?

Mr. BARBOUR. That will settle it. The attorney has a contract with Mr. Stockett to receive 40 per cent of any amount paid to Stockett. This requires that before any money shall be available under this appropriation the attorney shall file a release of Mr. Stockett under that contract.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In other words, Congress has gone out of its way to protect Mr. Stockett.

Mr. BARBOUR. Absolutely.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. I am not quite sure that Mr. Stockett is going to be entirely protected. In case this attorney does not cancel the 40 per cent contract, then Mr. Stockett would not receive a penny.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is true.

Mr. SCHAFER. We may reach the situation where Mr. Stockett will find that he is not going to get any money because the attorney may insist on not breaking the contract, and therefore Stockett may be forced, in order to receive some funds, to pay the attorney some of the funds which he receives under this amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He would be very foolish to do such a needless thing. We can not prevent Mr. Stockett from taking the money and throwing it into the Potomac River. We have protected him here.

Mr. SCHAFER. If this attorney does not release Mr. Stockett from the contract, then——

Mr. BARBOUR (interposing). Then nobody gets any money.

Mr. SCHAFER (continuing). In that case I think the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee, who is one of the conferees, should introduce a bill, upon the convening of the next Congress, for the relief of Mr. Stockett, and leave out all attorneys' fees, and the House should pass it immediately.

Mr. BARBOUR. I think somebody would probably introduce a bill to that effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 60: Page 85, line 1, insert:

"The sum of $3,654,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated for the relief of the States of Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas in the matter of roads and bridges damaged or destroyed by the floods of 1927, said sum of $3,654,000 to be apportioned as follows: To the State of Missouri, $258,418; to the State of Mississippi, $628,000; to the State of Louisiana, $967,582; to the State of Arkansas, $1,804,000: Provided, That any sums hereby appropriated shall be used to reimburse the States of Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas for money (1) actually expended in repairing and replacing damages to roads and bridges on the State highway systems of the respective States in amounts certified to the United States Bureau of Public Roads and verified by the bureau from records of such department as being so expended, and (2) to be expended on such road and bridge repairs not yet made, in accordance with the provisions of the Federal highway act, except that the provision limiting Federal payments to not exceed $15,000 per mile shall not apply and the provision restricting the expenditure of Federal funds upon roads on the system of Federal-aid highways shall not apply to the extent that such expenditure is hereby authorized on roads and bridges not on but which are extensions of said system within municipalities having a population of 2,500 or more, as shown by the last available census: Provided further, That any sum hereby appropriated for any State shall become available when the State shall have actually expended or shall have made available for expenditure a like sum from State funds for the purposes contained herein."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For the relief of the following States as a reimbursement or contribution in aid from the United States, induced by the extraordinary conditions of necessity and emergency resulting from the unusually serious financial loss to such States through the damage to or destruction of roads and bridges by the floods of 1927, imposing a public charge against the property of said States beyond their reasonable capacity to bear, and without acknowledgment of any liability on the part of the United States in connection with the restoration of such local improvements—namely, Missouri, $258,418; Mississippi, $628,000; Louisiana, $967,582; Arkansas, $1,800,000; in all, $3,654,000, to be available immediately and to remain available until expended: Provided, That such portion of the sums hereby appropriated as will be available for future construction shall be expended by the State highway departments of the respective States, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, for the restoration, including relocation, of roads and bridges so damaged or destroyed, in such manner as to give the largest measure of permanent relief, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided further, That any sum hereby appropriated for any State shall become available when the State shall have actually expended or shall have made available for expenditure a like sum from State funds for the purposes contained herein: Provided further, That where any roads or bridges shall be or shall have been constructed of a more expensive type than those which were damaged or destroyed, the appropriation contained herein shall not be used to defray any part of the increase in cost occasioned thereby."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment, and move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The motion now made by the chairman of the subcommittee is that the House insist upon its disagreement. May I ask would a motion to recede and concur have the status of a privileged motion at this time?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, may I explain the matter to the Chair? The Chair perhaps has not followed it very closely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be pleased to hear the gentleman on the parliamentary status.

Mr. CRAMTON. The situation is that the only amendment in dispute in the Interior Department appropriation bill is amendment No. 39. This amendment has been disagreed to by the House. The Senate has adopted an amendment to that amendment and has sent it back, and that amended amendment No. 39 is before us, and I am moving that we disagree to that amended amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now, what is the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. My inquiry is, Would a motion to recede and concur in the amendment made by the Senate have a privileged status?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It appears, at first blush, that it would have a privileged status.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Then I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House recede and concur in the amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I have not lost the floor. I will yield to the gentleman from Montana for him to make that motion, but I do not wish to lose the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan, of course, retains control of the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, has not the gentleman from Montana, being recognized, the right, in his own right, to make a preferential motion? He does not do it by the grace of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; but the Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Montana can take control of the floor away from the gentleman from Michigan by making a privileged motion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, of course, he could not take the floor away from the gentleman, but at the proper time it would be a matter of privilege for the gentleman from Montana to make the motion to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so stated.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to interfere with the gentleman making any motion he desires, but naturally I do want to retain control of the floor. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I understand, my motion is before the House to disagree to the Senate amendment. The gentleman from Montana has offered or desires to offer a motion. If he desires to offer that now, I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman desires, I will yield him five minutes to discuss his amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES. Is it contemplated to take up the Consent Calendar this afternoon?

Mr. SNELL. It is not expected to go on with the Consent Calendar; it will be late enough when we get through with this.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will yield for a short matter the gentleman from Pennsylvania wishes to present.

THE JONES BILL

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2901) known as the Jones bill be printed as if it had been referred to the committee, for use of Members of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Reserving the right to object, printed in the form it passed the Senate or showing the amendments that the Senate put on?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is to be printed in the form in which it passed the Senate.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. That would not show the amendments that the Senate put on. I have no objection to printing it, but I think it ought to show the amendments adopted in the Senate.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Yes; but there is a question going to be raised comparing it with the House bill and the amendments which the Senate put on should appear in the print as a matter of convenience. You will not be able to compare the original bill with the bill as it was amended and passed the Senate with the House bill unless the amendments put on by the Senate appear.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to yield further if there is going to be any lengthy discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylania.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This simply is a request to print and in no way affects the parliamentary situation?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 17223) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, and June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado reserved all points of order on said bill.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, in the Interior Department bill there was carried when it left the House a provision permitting the United States to condemn property in national parks. It was argued that it was necessary because they wanted to preserve the sequoia trees in Yosemite Park. That was the principal argument for taking private property in parks.

When the matter got over to the Senate an amendment was put on which provided that you could take privately owned property except that occupied for religious or hotel purposes. In other words, our bill as it left the House gave the right of general condemnation, and the Senate amendment provides that you can exercise the right in a limited degree. Certain property you can not condemn. You can negotiate between the people to buy the property, and if you can not buy it we do not accord the Government the right to go in and take it away. The situation if this amendment is agreed to will allow the Government to acquire any property, denude it of timber—any property that the Government needs.

But it does not give them the right to take my dwelling house; it does not give them the right to take a certain hotel in Glacier National Park, which people are anxious to get, and it does not give them the right to take one tract of land in Glacier Park that was acquired, before the park was established, by a religious organization that has had its meetings there for 25 years or more. As a general proposition I believe in the right of the Government to condemn property if it needs it, but I do not believe that we ought to lodge in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior the right, because of any grievance, real or fancied, to say to this man, "You get out of this park; I am going to take your property, the law gives me the right to say that it shall be condemned, and I am, therefore, going to condemn it and take it away from you." There are about two dozen homesteaders in Glacier National Park in Montana and one hotel, owned by a man named Lewis, which is sought, I am told, by the concessionaires of the park. Under this bill, as it passed the House, the Government would have the right to take that property. This exception or exemption denies that right. If the Government wanted the property, actually needed it for any purposes, I should be willing that it should take it, but it does not need it and I do not think we ought to lodge that authority in the Secretary of the Interior. I hope my motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment will be accepted.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, at this time of day I shall be extremely brief. What we are trying to do and what the Park Service wants to do is to eliminate privately owned lands in national parks, because private ownership is in conflict with the general public use that is consistent with the national-park idea. The Park Service is distinguished for its consideration and courtesy. It is not to be anticipated that it would be arbitrary or unfair in any case, and in those cases where condemnation proceedings are resorted to, of course, they will be under the local courts and the local juries, and no injustice is to be anticipated. The amendment as first agreed to in the Senate prevented any resort to condemnation although the general law for the acquisition of property for Government uses permits such action. This amendment as it now comes to us from the Senate forbids resort to condemnation where the property is used for residence, church, or hotel purposes in any of the 20 national parks. In other words, it would forbid resort to condemnation in connection with a great part of the lands that are to be secured.

The House took up the other day the Leavitt bill, which proposed to exempt from condemnation 10 acres, belonging to one religious organization in one park, and the House decisively, on a roll call, defeated that bill. This amendment that is now proposed by the Senate is much more far-reaching than that Leavitt bill, in that it proposes to exempt from condemnation not 10 acres for religious purposes in one park but all lands owned by religious organiaztions in all parks and, in addition, lands used for residences or hotel purposes in all parks. This House has been decisive in its votes on this matter before, having voted on January 17, on a standing vote, 72 to 16 against the Senate amendment, and again last Tuesday, on a roll call, 304 to 28. The Senate has not yet had a division upon this question at any stage of the proceedings—no roll call, no division, not even a show of hands. I think that is all, unless some one desires to ask a question. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that the amendment itself has not yet been reported. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate recede from its amendment No. 39 to the bill H. R. 15089, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," with an amendment as follows:

"In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate insert the following: 'or as to any privately owned lands as are not now occupied exclusively for residence, hotel, or religious purposes, by condemnation under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888 (U. S. C. 1302, sec. 257), whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior acquisition by condemnation proceedings is necessary or advantageous to the Government.'"

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not understand this amendment. Does this exempt hotel property from the provisions of the law as we passed it?

Mr. CRAMTON. It exempts from resort to condemnation all hotel, residential, and religious organization property.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Forever?

Mr. CRAMTON. As far as this appropriation is concerned; and this appropriation is available until expended.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman accept that?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; I have asked the House to reject it.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. HARE. As I understand, this provides to condemn hotel property in this particular park—in this Glacier National Park?

Mr. YON. It exempts it from condemnation.

Mr. CRAMTON. The proposal of the bill as it passed the House is to authorize the Park Service to acquire all privately owned property in all the national parks. The Senate proposition is to permit them to purchase it but not to permit them to resort to condemnation as to residential, religious, or hotel property.

Mr. HARE. Suppose we gave them the right to condemn this property under this bill—to condemn this hotel. Then will the Park Commission or the officials representing the commission have the right to lease the property to some one else, who, in turn, may lease the property?

Mr. CRAMTON. The hotel property spoken of will, no doubt, change hands before this bill becomes a law. Negotiations are now under way and no doubt will be completed within a short time. The land will be fully controlled by the Government.

I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this Interior Department appropriation bill has been held up in the Senate for two months practically on one item. I feel that we ought to settle this matter once and for all; do it now. The House has already voted on it twice.

It is the position of the House committee that the Congress of the United States should never waive or suspend its rights of eminent domain within the national parks. It is tremendously important to the orderly development and proper administration of our 20 national parks that the private property therein should be, as far as reasonably possible, purchased and controlled by the Federal Government. No National park or State park or city park can be conducted in an orderly manner and made a proper and orderly outing pleasure resort if there are a lot of private property owners scattered all over it capitalizing the opportunities of profiteering on the crowds and conducting any kind of business or game to fleece the public, and without any control over them. These private property owners cause an immense amount of annoyance in these national parks. They clamor to have the Government spend millions of dollars developing the parks for them to get the benefit of it, not only by enormously enhancing the value of their property but enabling them to conduct filling stations, soft-drink joints, and hot-dog stands, and any kind of a scheme to get the money, and with practically no restraint on them. If the people of these States containing so-called national parks do not want them, they should memorialize Congress to repeal the law creating them; and if they do want a real national park, instead of a private graft, they ought to help Congress and the National Park Bureau to put private enterprises out of them and make them real pleasure resorts and free from private exploitation. What these Montana gentlement want is to have the large number of private property owners in their national park exempt.

They say in effect that they are exceedingly anxious for the Government to spend vast sums on building roads to enhance the value of their properties in the park and that if Uncle Sam wants any of it he will pay them whatever they see fit to ask for it, or let it alone. They are not even willing to let the Federal Government have the right of condemnation in their own courts and before their own juries. This House has twice emphatically disapproved of Montana's position. Then the gentleman [Mr. LEAVITT] tried to pass a special bill to exempt 73 acres belonging to a religious organization from ever being taken by the Government. After a very full debate the House overwhelmingly voted against that bill. The basic principle involved and what this House has twice decided is that no property in a park or anywhere else under our flag should ever be declared by Congress to be superior to the right of the Federal Government to take it for Government purposes, by an orderly proceeding in condemnation. This affects not only the Glacier National Park, but all of the national parks. If Congress directly, or tacitly, or impliedly waives that Federal right of eminent domain in one park all of them will at once demand the same exemption. I have insisted, and our committee has insisted, that we should not waive the right of Uncle Sam to take any private property if necessary in any of the parks and should treat them all alike. Aside from the Yosemite, where it may become necessary, I do not know of any park where there is any present intention of resorting to any condemnation proceedings, but I am not willing by an act of Congress or otherwise to surrender the Government's right to do so if it should become necessary.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman speaks of waiving the right. We have never had the right before, have we?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I think so. In fact, I understand the senior Senator from Montana, who is one of the best lawyers in that body, expressly states that the Government now has the right of eminent domain in the national parks, but he wants a provision in this bill that would prevent or limit the use of the money herein appropriated to the purchase only of private property in these parks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman three additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not like the expression of "waiving." We do not waive anything. What is proposed here is for the first time to assert a power, and it is proposed to do it in an appropriation bill to legislate on an appropriation bill, and some of us who are opposed to that would not wish to assent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. You understand that this proposition in this bill authorizing the acquisition of private property in these parks by purchase or by condemnation was put in the bill in this House without objection and to meet an urgent necessity, more especially in the Yosemite Park and with the understanding that every dollar Congress appropriates would be matched by private contributions for that purpose. There are a number of wealthy public-spirited people who are anxious to help the Government of the United States toward the elimination of private property from the parks, because they know from observation and experience in other public parks all over the world that sooner or later these private holdings must be cleaned out if a national park is to be a success.

This provision in controversy provides that the Government may take certain property by purchase, but it at least by inference, if not directly, prohibits us from taking it otherwise.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Senate provision is more than an inference when it limits us to purchase. It excludes the idea of condemnation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; the Government could not use any of the money herein provided for that purpose. It is that limitation, that principle, that precedent that this House objects to. The question is whether or not Congress is going to hamper and hamstring the National Park Service and the Department of the Interior in their efforts at orderly and public-spirited development of our parks and making them attractive by preventing them from acquiring property that is needed by the Government for the systematic and proper management of the national parks in this country. We are spending hundreds of millions of dollars in trying to encourage the public sentiment and desire of "seeing America first" and inducing the people to visit all of the national parks. We have been trying to make our national parks the most attractive parks in the world; and when we spend millions of dollars, as we are doing with wonderful success, and the visitors to our parks are increasing by millions; and yet there are some people in nearly every park that are holding out and doing their utmost to capitalize any efforts and profiteer upon the public to the serious detriment of its parks and to the traveling public.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The gentleman has stated that there is supposed to be general authority for the use of condemnation in the acquisition of such private lands.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we assume that the Government has that authority.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I take issue with the gentleman on that particular point. I believe the general authority is vested, as the gentleman says, in the act of August 1, 1888.

Mr. CRAMTON. Absolutely.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I think that act refers only to the acquisition by purchase or condemnation of property, the acquisition of which has been previously authorized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will take a half minute to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. May I just finish?

Mr. CRAMTON. I know what the gentleman is coming to. The act says that whenever the acquisition of land is authorized then condemnation proceedings may be resorted to, when advantageous to the Government.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Exactly. Can the gentleman tell me when the acquisition of private property within national parks has been authorized?

Mr. CRAMTON. This particular item authorizes the acquisition of property by purchase or condemnation, in accordance with the law.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. In other words, this is general law on an appropriation act?

Mr. CRAMTON. No.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Because the act of August 1, 1888, refers only to the acquisition by purchase or condemnation of property, the acquisition of which has already been authorized.

Mr. CRAMTON. The acquisition of lands in the national parks is authorized in the general national park legislation; if not, it is authorized as a continuation of a work in progress and if not the pending bill authorized it as it passed the House, and the Senate proposition before us is to take it out from under the general law as to condemnation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to discuss this matter at any length, except that the bill which I introduced has been referred to several times. The situation is that there is a great deal of disagreement as to whether the power to condemn now exists as it has to do with lands in the national parks. Now, the difficulty is simply this, that instead of this matter having come in the regular course through the legislative committee and the situation having been placed before the legislative committee, there has been an effort to meet a condition that has suddenly arisen by something written into an appropriation bill. The claim has been made that this right exists but it is denied that it does exist. I am not going to raise any question here as to the general policy of the Government in acquiring private lands in national parks as rapidly as that can be done. That is not what I have in mind. The bill I introduced the other day was intended to meet a situation that is not taken care of in this bill. It had to do with land belonging to a religious organization and which organization has held the land for some time. The proposal here is that if a private individual owns land and it is condemned or purchased a lease can be given to him for its use for the rest of his life, but you can not do that with the particular organization that has this land. What I have been pleading for is legislation that will meet all of the conditions that exist in the national parks, but our whole difficulty here to-day is that the Appropriations Committee has tried to meet an emergency that should have gone to the legislative committee and everything in connection with it should have been from that committee. It should not have been written into an appropriation bill and placed before the House in such a way that the vote on the principle or as to what ought to be done comes on an item in an appropriation bill.

I have no delusion with regard to the result of this vote, and I do not want to be put on record as saying that we should not in many cases have the power to acquire lands in national parks; in fact, our senior Senator, if I can refer to him without violating the rules, has stated that under most conditions there should be the right to acquire these lands. There is no difference of opinion with regard to that. But let this stand as a warning to the House, that matters of this kind which have to do with the property rights of individuals ought to be put before this House through the legislative committee, after hearings, and not brought here as emergency items in bills that are in the form of appropriation bills.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. What is the emergency which requires such haste and expeditious action?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman from Michigan answer that question?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think I will answer it. I will only take two minutes because it is so far past the adjournment time.

I will say that the provision put in the House bill, except as to some minor details that we could have eliminated if necessary, was not subject to a point of order. The purchase of land is authorized. The emergency is that in many of these parks undesirable use is being made of privately owned lands, with bootlegging joints and dilapidated shacks lining expensive, scenic highways.

I have no private interest in this, no personal interest to be served; my only interest is that the national parks shall be opened from one end to the other to the people of the Nation and that there shall not be fences put up with signs on them, "Private—Keep Out." I can show you a number of pictures where that kind of sign confronts the public when they visit national parks. I hope this program will go through unmutilated.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will concede that those who are opposing his views have no personal or private interest in the matter.

Mr. CRAMTON. I can not say that and be entirely truthful.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. With reference to all of us?

Mr. CRAMTON. As to the gentlemen here present, I can cheerfully say that.

I move the previous question——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Before the gentleman moves the previous question, will he answer one question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes. I want to meet the wishes of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has it ever been definitely determined that under existing law the Government has not the authority to condemn private property in public parks for Government uses?

Mr. CRAMTON. The Solicitor for the Interior Department holds that that right exists, and it has never been determined by a court to the contrary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that is true, why the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not legislation, I will say to the gentleman; but the solicitor holds that that power exists now.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield for one question? It seems to me that a sort of impassé has been reached——

Mr. CRAMTON. And the Interior Department appropriation bill is in danger.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Might it not be a good thing to specify the specific parks and the specific class of property to be purchased, because I know, as the gentleman knows, that certain property should be acquired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly. It is very essential that this privately owned property be acquired and it is dangerous to fool with the situation. I will say to the gentleman that we have not the parliamentary power here to propose any amendment to the Senate amendment. I do not know how they succeeded in doing it, but we certainly can not offer another amendment which would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is confronted with a somewhat puzzling problem in this connection, owing to the very peculiar parliamentary situation. It seems that the Senate has taken a most unusual course to say the least in receding from its own amendment and amending the same. In view of this situation the motion of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] now is that the House agree to the Senate amendment as amended, and the question is on this motion.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. EVANS of Montana) there were—ayes 12, noes 42.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the vote would indicate there is not a quorum present, and I make the point of order there is not a quorum present. I withdraw the point, Mr. Speaker.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will message to the Senate that the House has disagreed to the amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the Chair think it necessary to have a vote on my motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The exact opposite of the gentleman's motion having been disagreed to, the Chair thinks it equivalent to an affirmative vote on the gentleman's motion, and therefore will not put the question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the gentleman from Michigan ask for a further conference?

Mr. CRAMTON. No.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from West Virginia rise?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] may have the time extended for filing minority views on the Muscle Shoals bill until next Monday. The gentleman has been very busy in his committee and has not had an opportunity to file them, and I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended until next Monday to bring in minority views.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] may be allowed until Monday next to file minority views on the bill referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE

FRIDAY, February 22, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord God of hosts, whose mind embraces all mankind, whose heart is wide to harbor all our race, we thank Thee that though the ages stretch beyond our grasp, though life puts on her myriad forms and wastes herself in vain designs, Thou holdest all within the hollow of Thy hand, and though the march of man reaches from dusk to dawn, from the abyss to the throne, and generations rise and pass away, Thou leadest everyone.

Make us, therefore, ever mindful of Thy loving care, and, as we reverently pause in the midst of thronging duties to pay grateful tribute to the Father of our Country, bring into captivity every thought, that we may commune with what is high and holy in Thy sight and rejoice only in the fair and fragrant things of virtue and honor.

Kindle within us a flame in this aspiring hour that shall consume every grosser passion, that from our life henceforth, as from a lamp of Thine, a light may shine upon the ways of men. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. REED of Missouri read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

Friends and fellow citizens, the period for a new election of a citizen to administer the Executive Government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office of which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experiences, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficience—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secured to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This Government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affections, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposses each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigating by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith;—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error. I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

UNITED STATES, GEO. WASHINGTON.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1781) to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 39, as amended, to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the following concurrent resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. Con. Res. 56. Concurrent resolution to provide for the printing and binding of the proceedings in Congress and in Statuary Hall of the unveiling upon the acceptance of the statues of Henry Clay and Dr. Ephraim McDowell presented by the State of Kentucky, and for the distribution of the 2,500 copies authorized to be printed; and

H. Con. Res. 57. Concurrent resolution to provide for the printing of the first edition of the Congressional Directory of the first session of the Seventy-first Congress.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION LAW—CORRECTION

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD a brief item from the New York Herald Tribune of to-day. It refers to an error made by that newspaper in ascribing a certain statement to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the item will be printed in the RECORD.

The item referred to is as follows:

QUOTATIONS FROM REED ATTRIBUTED TO BORAH—ERROR IN TRANSMISSION CAUSED THE HERALD TRIBUNE ERROR

The New York Herald Tribune has received the following telegram from Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH:

"WASHINGTON, February 21, 1929.

"To the EDITOR OF THE HERALD TRIBUNE:

"The quotation attributed to me in your leading editorial to-day is taken literally from Senator REED'S speech. I made no such utterance. I am sure you will do me the justice to make the correction in your paper.

"WM. E. BORAH."

The quotation which Senator BORAH refers to was as follows:

"Men and women who in the old days would never have served a drink in their homes, or, if they did, would serve a little glass of wine, now dish it out, and mothers hand their daughters the liquor—girls of the same type who a few years ago would never have received anything but warning from their mothers. Girls guzzle it with boys."

The Herald Tribune deeply regrets that an error in transmission wrongly attributed this statement by Senator REED to Mr. BORAH.

ANNUAL REPORT OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS COMMISSION

Mr. SMOOT presented the annual report of the Public Buildings Commission for the year ended December 31, 1928; which, with the accompanying illustrations, was ordered to be printed as a Senate document.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION

Mr. BLAINE presented resolutions adopted by the Chicago & North Western Railway Employees' Club, of Green Bay, Wis., favoring the passage of legislation to regulate all interstate transportation, whether by bus, motor truck, or coastwise water carrier, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

DAMAGES BY CANADIAN SMELTER

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have a joint resolution adopted by the State Legislature of the State of Washington on the subject of damages being done to citizens of that State by a smelter located across the Canadian line. The resolution is somewhat lengthy and I will not ask that it be read, but I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD following my remarks and referred to the Foreign Relations Committee.

I merely wish to add that the smelter mentioned is causing destruction on the American side of the line that is positively taking away the livelihood of the people who live there. The joint high commission which is investigating it with a view to settlement is proceeding rather slowly. I had hoped the commission might have made a report before this time in order that some action could be taken to protect the people on this side of the Canadian line.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolution

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, That—

Whereas there is situated near Trail, British Columbia, Canada, a certain smelting and refining plant for the treating and smelting of mineral ores, which said plant is owned and operated by the Consolidated Smelting & Refining Co. (Ltd.), and is one of the largest operated on the American continent, and located about 8 miles north of the international boundary line, and due north of Stevens County, State of Washington; and

Whereas it is conceded by responsible officials of said Consolidated Smelting & Refining Co. (Ltd.) that in excess of 1,000 tons of sulphur dioxide (SO_2) is emitted from the stacks of such smelter during every 24 hours; and

Whereas about the year 1925 the stacks of such smelter plant were raised from a height of about 230 feet to a height of about 409 feet, and since the time of such raising of such stacks injury and damage from gases and fumes emitted therefrom has become very destructive to lands and homes in northern Stevens County, Wash.; and

Whereas property owners of northern Stevens County, Wash., have complained of damages from such fumes and gases over an area of approximately 25 miles by 40 miles, and such damage is continuous and gradually spreading and increasing in degree of destruction; and

Whereas responsible officials of said Consolidated Smelting & Refining Co. (Ltd.), at a hearing before the International Joint Commission at Northport, Wash., on October 10, 1928, stated that in their judgment such fumes and gases could not be controlled at such smelter plant unless at great and unreasonable expense and hardship, and thereupon requested of such commission that the Consolidated Smelting & Refining Co. (Ltd.) be permitted to come into the State of Washington and make private settlements for such damages, and that such settlements be approved by the said commission as though testimony had been taken under Article X of the existing treaty, and, if this permission should be refused, that said Consolidated Smelting & Refining Co. (Ltd.) be permitted to purchase smoke easements in the State of Washington; and

Whereas in the area now affected by such gases and fumes there is a large acreage of property owned by the State of Washington, the county of Stevens, the Government of the United States, and by private property owners, and if such gases and fumes are permitted to continue to lodge thereon the total market value of these lands so affected will be virtually destroyed, homes and farms will be abandoned, tax values destroyed, and tax burdens shifted to others who are property owners in the State of Washington; and

Whereas the flow of these destructive gases and fumes in and upon the territory of the State of Washington from the above-mentioned smelter plant can be avoided by the action of the said Consolidated Smelting & Refining Co. (Ltd.) either by reducing the height of the smelter smokestacks or by the use of modern machinery and chemical processes now in use in other smelter plants: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the house of representatives of the twenty-first legislative assembly, representing the people of the State of Washington, respectfully protest against the invasion of the territory of the State of Washington and the rights of the people therein by gases and fumes drifting through currents of the air from the plant of the Consolidated Smelting & Refining Co. (Ltd.) situated near Trail, British Columbia, Canada, and do hereby call upon the Congress of the United States to assist in proper steps—

1. To bring about the prompt cessation of the invasion of American territory and the rights of the people therein by gases and fumes drifting from the aforesaid smelter plant.

2. That upon the permanent cessation of such invasion of gases and fumes from such smelter plant that the State of Washington, Stevens County, and persons owning property therein be promptly paid and reimbursed for damages suffered by reason of such gases and fumes aforesaid; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Washington in Congress, and to the Secretary of State for the United States, and to the members of the International Joint Commission at Ottawa, Canada, and at Washington, D. C.

I, the undersigned, hereby certify that the above is a true copy of a resolution unanimously adopted by the house of representatives February 15, 1929.

A. W. CALDER,
Chief Clerk.

CLAIMS OF MONTANA INDIAN TRIBES AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I send to the desk a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana embodying a resolution in the nature of a memorial relating to a suit brought in the Court of Claims by certain Indian tribes of the State of Montana, in which complaint was filed on the 10th of July, 1925, and to which no answer has yet been filed by the Government, awaiting action by the Comptroller General. The delay seems to be altogether indefensible. I ask that the memorial may be published in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

House Joint Memorial 4 (introduced by Nelson and Jones) to the Congress of the United States requesting that speedy consideration be given claims of the Indian tribes herein mentioned and that the Comptroller General be directed to submit his data on the compilation of the counterclaims of the United States against said Indian tribes

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Whereas the various tribes of Indians of the State of Montana have instituted an action by the filing of a petition in the Court of Claims of the United States No. E–427, under date of July 10, 1925, to hear, determine, and adjudicate the rights of the said various tribes of Indians arising under certain treaty stipulations, covenants, and agreements; and

Whereas the said petition has been pending and unnecessarily delayed too long in the said Court of Claims; and

Whereas the Comptroller General has been dilatory in filing the counterclaims of the United States and has thereby unnecessarily prolonged the consideration of this action; and

Whereas the said various tribes of Indians who are now citizens of the United States, by virtue of the act of Congress of June 2, 1924, and have therefore become an integral part of the Nation and are entitled to some consideration in respect to their vested property rights: Now, therefore,

THE DECENNIAL CENSUS AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a considerable amount of material bearing upon the amendment which I have offered to the census bill, providing that all the supervisors, supervisor clerks, special agents, interpreters, and enumerators who are to be employed in connection with the taking of the next decennial census shall be selected under civil-service rules and regulations.

I wish to say just a word in this connection. I was induced to offer the amendment by a consideration which was very well expressed in a paper put forth by the National Civil Service Reform Association, which stated that—

Past experience shows that the grossest abuses, frauds, inaccuracies, corruption, and extravagance have followed every exemption of census employees from the provisions of the civil service law.

The material I desire to have inserted in the RECORD consists, first, of a statement of our different censuses, beginning with the census of 1890, prepared by a civic group in the city of Washington, followed by a letter from Mr. John T. Doyle, secretary of the United States Civil Service Commission, written to me on January 8, 1929; a letter from the same writer to Mr. J. W. Carson, secretary to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], dated January 14, 1929; a letter from the secretary of the National Civil Service Reform League to my colleague [Mr. TYDINGS], dated December 11, 1928; a protest by the National Civil Service Reform League, urging the adoption of the amendment offered by me to the census bill; a letter from the Southern California Civil Service League, dated February 5, 1929, to me, urging the adoption of my amendment; a similar letter from a member of the Women's Department of Civil Service of the City of Baltimore, the writer being Mrs. J. A. Wilson, a prominent lady of Baltimore, urging the adoption of the amendment; a letter from the State Federation of Pennsylvania Women to me, dated January 8, 1929, urging the adoption of the amendment; a letter from Mrs. Charles E. Ellicott, president, and Mrs. L. Emmett Holt, jr., secretary, of the American League of Women Voters, in the form of a resolution adopted by that league, also urging the adoption of the amendment; a copy of an article from the Woman's Journal of July, 1928, entitled "Mrs. Knapp," reciting the gross abuses and scandals developed in the taking of the census in the State of New York.

The material also includes an editorial from the St. Louis Daily Globe of February 11, 1929, approving the adoption of the amendment; an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of February 6, 1929, headed "Census and Civil Service"; a letter from Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, of Harvard University, dated January 3, 1929, relating to the amendment; another letter from Mr. Godfrey L. Cabot, one of the most prominent citizens of Boston, whom many Senators know, relating to the same subject; and, lastly, a letter from Adelbert Moot, of Buffalo, N. Y., to me, dated February 5, 1929, bearing on the same subject.

There being no objection, the matter submitted by Mr. BRUCE was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 15, 1929.

CIVIL SERVICE AND THE CENSUS

Since December 12, H. R. 393, a bill to provide for the Fifteenth Decennial Census has been on the Senate Calendar, having been favorably reported with amendments from the Committee on Commerce. An additional amendment not considered by the committee, but of great public interest, has been proposed since the bill was reported, and is now on the table ready to be called up whenever the bill is considered by the Senate. By amending section 3 of the bill it would remove the exemption from civil-service regulations which is now given in respect to the appointment of special agents, supervisors, enumerators, and interpreters to be employed in taking the census and would make the merit system apply to those employments.

In introducing that amendment, Senator BRUCE, of Maryland, its sponsor, is carrying on a long fight to extend civil-service rules to the temporary census-taking force.

A BRIEF OUTLINE OF THAT FIGHT

The civil service act was passed in 1883. In the summer of 1889 President Harrison was requested by the Civil Service Commission to adopt competitive examinations for the selection of the census force for the approaching decennial task, the taking of the Eleventh Census. He refused and left with the superintendent of the census the power to make selections for the service. The superintendent recommended the supervisors, each one to be in charge of a district and they designated the enumerator. It was the spoils system all the way through, with the usual charges of waste and scandals which had always accompanied the taking of the census.

In March, 1897, a bill was introduced to provide for taking the Twelfth Census. It had a provision that the employees should be appointed under the classified civil service. The Senate committee struck the provision out, and when the President appointed a new Census Director the force was again appointed under the patronage system.

In 1908, in preparation for the next, the Thirteenth Census, President Roosevelt sent a special message to Congress, urging that the census employees should be selected by civil-service rules. Nevertheless, a bill characterized by the spoils features passed both Houses. It was vetoed by the President and returned to the Congress with a vigorous message upholding civil-service standards. The bill was returned in the last short session, just before a new administration was to come into power. To the chagrin of the friends of the patronage system, the incoming President, Mr. Taft, announced that he would veto any bill which contained the same spoils provisions.

A chastened Congress therefore passed a bill which required civil-service examinations for a considerable portion of the temporary census force—all the clerical staff was included—a force of about 7,000 workers.

The bill provided that the supervisors (a little more than 300 in number) were to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. About 1,800 special agents and approximately 65,000 enumerators were not specifically placed under the civil service, but the Director of the Census at that time (Mr. E. Dana Durand) was a friend of the merit system, and he prescribed an examination to be conducted by the Civil Service Commission.

The census of 1910 is the high-water mark, so far as civil service is concerned. It has had less serious criticism than any other census within the last 40 years. Both the accuracy of its statistics and its use of public funds were widely commended in contrast to the general attacks on previous enumerations.

The act providing for the census of 1920 (the fourteenth) retained the civil-service provisions of the preceding act, so far as the temporary clerical staff was concerned. However, it directed that the supervisors should be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census. These supervisors in turn were authorized to appoint, with the approval of the Director of the Census, the enumerators and interpreters. Special agents were appointed by the Director of the Census. Civil-service rules were not mentioned at all in this act. The Director of the Census was given complete discretion.

To that extent the provisions of paragraph 3 of section 3 of the pending bill are a backward step, for the director is specially ordered to appoint this staff without reference to the civil service act. The Bruce amendment would strike out that prohibition and substitute a provision making civil-service rules apply.

THE PRESENT ASPECT OF THE CONFLICT

The group of temporary employees which Senator BRUCE's amendment would reach is large and important.

At the hearings on the pending bill which were held by the House committee in January, 1928, it was stated by a representative of the Census Bureau that during the coming census there will be a temporary clerical force of from 7,000 to 8,000 persons. These will be employed under civil-service rules according to the bill. The group of special agents, supervisors, supervisors' clerks, and interpreters will be larger than that. Ten thousand was the estimate given. And in appointing this group the director is instructed to do so without reference to the civil service act. Likewise the 95,0000 enumerators, which it is estimated will be necessary, are exempt.

The Civil Service Commission, by letter and by representation, urged that the proposed exemption should be removed from all of this group except enumerators. The enumerators are so many in number and their term of employment is so short—normally from 15 to 30 days—that their appointment by competitive examination is neither so easy nor so important to secure as that of the special agents and supervisors appears to be.

There will be approximately 375 supervisors in the field during this census. Each supervisor will select the enumerators under him, direct them, and be responsible for the work in his district. The length of employment for supervisors will vary—from four months to a year probably.

The group of special agents is larger. Under the census law of 1902 special agents are appointed to collect statistics in the field. Their duties are varied. It would appear from the brief statement on the subject made at the hearing before the House committee that many aspects of census taking apart from the simple population enumeration may fall to their jurisdiction. Records of marriage and divorce, of religious bodies, of city and State finance are made by special agents, and for this purpose the representative of the Census Bureau testified that State and city officials and clergymen often receive temporary appointments as special agents of the Census Bureau. It is estimated that about 2,000 special agents will be needed during the coming census period.

A BRIEF SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENTS

Representatives of the Census Bureau testified at the House hearing that it would be impossible to place this group of special agents, supervisors, enumerators, etc., under civil-service rules because the employment is temporary.

The spokesman for the civil service stated in answer that placing positions under civil-service regulation does not necessarily mean that a competitive examination must be offered. The civil service act provides for special noncompetitive examinations and likewise it permits short-term employment without examination. The practice is regularly followed. Officials of the Civil Service Commission have publicly stated that they would be satisfied to permit such an exemption in the case of all the census enumerators. In this connection the experience of the 1910 census should be recalled. Then, although not required by law, the enumerators were selected through practical examinations conducted by the Civil Service Commission at the request of the Director of the Census.

That leaves special agents and supervisors and supervisors' clerks as the major group to be considered.

No argument is advanced to support the exemption of supervisors' clerks, but opposition to the inclusion of the supervisors themselves is usually based on the assertion that it is difficult to secure suitable candidates under civil-service procedure in addition to the fact that the employment is temporary. Supervisors should be persons enjoying the confidence of the community, with organizing and administrative experience. The integrity of the census figures must be their responsibility. To secure an honest and intelligent staff of enumerators a representative of the Census Bureau stated at the hearing, "We would have to depend on the judgment and honesty of the supervisor who appoints the enumerators." It is an important position and to argue that it should not be subject to civil-service regulation is to assume that under those regulations qualified persons can not be secured. That is an assumption not warranted by an examination of the facts.

A constantly increasing number of positions which demand administrative and organizing ability are being filled by the Civil Service Commission. Every department of the Government depends upon it to fill positions requiring those abilities. The commission's examining boards throughout the country offer a means of securing proper personnel which no single Government bureau has available. The commission itself states that it would have no difficulty in obtaining suitable candidates to certify to the Census Bureau for appointment as supervisors in the coming census.

Likewise in the case of special agents. In the past grave abuses have developed because some special agents have been retained from one census to another, often doing work properly coming under the permanent classified service. The only argument advanced against the inclusion of this force of 2,000 is based on the temporary nature of their employment.

In answer to this objection the Civil Service Commission again points out that it is its privilege and policy to give exemption from examination in the case of employment which is actually temporary—from one to two months for example (p. 51 of the House hearings).

In addition, the flexibility of its rules encourages whatever modification of examining procedure might be necessary to give the Census Bureau the opportunity to secure the best-qualified staff available for the short-time employment.

To quote the representative of the commission who testified at the hearing (p. 56):

"We would consult with the Census Bureau officials, find what the duties are, and what, in their opinion, is the type of man they need, and would reach an agreement as to the kind and scope of the examination, then proceed to establish lists so as to be ready when they are needed."

No argument has been advanced in behalf of these exemptions which is not familiar to those who have protested similar exemptions in the past. Every one can be applied to any extension of the merit system. They were all used to prevent the inclusion of the clerical staff employed in Washington during the census period. However, the civil-service rules were applied and there is no suggestion that it has not been successful.

IN CONCLUSION

No one contends that the Director of the Census could not select competent appointees without civil-service rules if he were permitted to do it without the interference from political sources which we know as the spoils system. It may be assumed that any bureau chief might discover and employ an able staff if his independent judgment as to qualifications were to be his only guide. However, it would be naive to assume that such a condition exists and unnecessary to present the arguments for the merit system. The civil service act is a protection to right-minded Members of Congress from the immense pressure upon them to find jobs for their importuning constituents. It is a protection to the honest bureau chief against the entreaties of those harrassed Members of Congress. Finally it is a protection to the public.

The coming census is unusually important. The 1920 enumeration was taken during the postwar period when there were unusual difficulties in its way. In addition the group of employees to which the Bruce amendment would apply was not selected under civil-service rules. The figures of that census have been severely challenged. The chairman of the Census Committee in the House stated in the hearing on H. R. 393 that one of the principal reasons why no reapportionment bill had been passed was because of the lack of confidence in that enumeration.

A reapportionment bill has just passed the House. Certainly public confidence in the reports of the census about to be taken should be sought. There would seem to be no better safeguard than to apply the merit system to the whole service and remove the stigma of the spoils system from the entire staff.

The particular problems of organizing a large temporary force should be recognized and can be met under civil service law. By cooperation with the Census Bureau Chief, by modification of its examining procedure to provide suitable tests and proper exemptions in the case of strictly temporary work, the difficulties cited in opposition to the application of civil-service regulations can be overcome. The virtues of the civil service need not be defended now, nor the scandals of the old spoils system discussed. It need only be said that there appears to be no valid reason why the employment policies of this Government should be suspended in respect to the temporary census staff. Therefore the amendment offered by Senator BRUCE should be adopted.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1929.

Senator WILLIAM CABELL BRUCE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BRUCE: The commission is pleased to observe your amendment to H. R. 393, providing that the census field force shall be subject to the civil service act.

The census act for the Thirteenth Census (1910) required the commission to hold examinations and establish registers from which appointments were to be made by the Director of the Census. The results of those examinations showed the practicability of supplying eligibles in large numbers in a limited time. On June 30, 1909, the Census Bureau had on its rolls about 650 names of persons employed in Washington. By June 30, 1910, the force had increased to approximately 3,000, and on October 1, 1910, to about 3,650. All of these were appointed as a result of competitive examinations and by selection from the head of the register with due regard to the apportionment. The 71,500 census enumerators in that census and a large number of special agents, though not classified under the rules, were selected through practical examinations held throughout the United States. The Director of the Census made use of the commission's nearly 5,000 local examining boards, candidates being assembled at points convenient to their places of residence. The results of the application of the merit principle in the Thirteenth Census appear to justify the belief that the same system should be followed in the selection of the personnel required in the Fifteenth Census.

The commission is of the view that the civil service act and rules are sufficiently flexible to admit of their application in a practicable degree to the field force of the census, and that where necessary exception could be made from competition by action of the commission.

Your amendment is therefore favored.

By direction of the commission:

Very respectfully,

JOHN T. DOYLE, Secretary.

JANUARY 14, 1929.

Mr. J. W. CARSON,

Secretary to Senator Couzens, United States Senate.

DEAR MR. CARSON: In response to your letter of January 12, I would state that at two previous censuses the enumerators and special agents were appointed through the machinery of the commission on request of the Director of the Census. In its twenty-seventh report, page 15, the commission said:

"The 71,500 1910 census enumerators and a large number of special agents, though not classified under the rules, were selected through practical examinations held throughout the United States. Although not required by law, they were ordered by the Director of the Census. The Director of the Census made use of the commission's local examining boards, the candidates being assembled at points convenient to their places of residence. This method was a great improvement over that followed in the census of 1900, when the examination papers were filled out by the competitors at their homes."

The commission has large registers of suitable eligibles for rural carrier, clerks and carriers in post offices, clerks in the Railway Mail Service, and for a large number of various field positions.

The failure to use the eligibles who have been obtained at large expense is inconsistent with good faith on the part of the Government. The appointment of this large census force every 10 years under the patronage system fosters in the public mind a cynical disbelief in the merit system and discourages qualified persons from undertaking the examinations.

Such further examinations as might be necessary could be promptly held by the commission's nearly 5,000 boards of examiners under the direction of the commission's 13 district secretaries. The supervisors, clerks, interpreters, enumerators, and special agents could be selected under appropriate tests of fitness either from existing registers or by competitive or noncompetitive examination or by allowing temporary appointment without examination.

The civil service act and rules are so flexible that no embarrassment would be experienced in making such appointments under them. For instance, the weighers of mail were appointed from the commission's registers by voluntary action of the post office. It is merely a question of the commission being given the comparatively small additional appropriation. It would be found a great economy to use the commission's facilities as was done by the War and Navy Departments during the war period and for the bonus force.

Very respectfully,

JOHN T. DOYLE, Secretary.

NATIONAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE,
New York City, December 11, 1928.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the National Civil Service Reform League, we respectfully and earnestly urge that you disapprove in its present form the census bill (H. R. 393) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses. The blanket exemption from the provisions of the civil service act for all special agents, supervisors, supervisors' clerks, enumerators, and interpreters which appears in the bill as passed by the House should be stricken out.

In urging you to eliminate this general exemption we are not unmindful of the possibility that it may prove to be impracticable to select all the enumerators through competitive examination. A specific exemption from the rules of competitive examination in the bill itself is, however, unnecessary in order to take care of any exemptions that may be desirable. The civil service act specifically provides for just such situations as may arise in the administration of the census act. Under the civil service law the President is authorized to provide by Executive order for the exemption from competitive examination of any position or class of positions.

Experience in previous censuses conducted by the Federal Government and also by State governments has shown that the large majority of employees included in such positions as special agents, supervisors, supervisors' clerks, enumerators, and interpreters have been selected solely upon the basis of political affiliation and without regard to fitness for the work to be done where such positions have been filled without competitive examination. Only recently New York State has had an example of the waste and corruption which follows the distribution of such positions as political patronage. The cost of the 1925 census for the State of New York was estimated at $1,200,000, but this was not sufficient to complete the compilation of statistical information which was intended to be produced.

The employees in the New York State census bureau, with but three exceptions, were employed without any tests of fitness by the civil-service commission. A report recently issued by an official investigator on behalf of the governor states that about $200,000 was either illegally or wastefully expended under this type of administration.

We are sure that you will wish to place in the bill every possible safeguard against the waste of public funds in the administration of the decennial census. We believe, therefore, that you should be willing to entrust to the judgment of the President the extent to which it may be practicable to select the census employees after competitive examination.

Respectfully yours,

H. ELIOT KAPLAN, Secretary.

A PROTEST AGAINST AN INEFFICIENT CENSUS—NATIONAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE URGES ADOPTION OF THE BRUCE AMENDMENT TO THE CENSUS BILL

The permanent staff and employees of the United States Census Bureau are appointed in accordance with the provisions of the civil service law. The work of the bureau from year to year has been eminently satisfactory.

In connection with the proposed decennial census to be taken in 1930 it is provided by H. R. 393, now before the Senate, that all other temporary employees—special agents, supervisors, supervisors' clerks, enumerators, and interpreters—who, it is estimated, will number about 100,000, shall be appointed by the Director of the Census without reference to the civil service law. The Director of the Census may delegate to the supervisors authority to appoint enumerators.

Thus in its present form the bill makes possible the appointment of about 100,000 persons with no assurance whatever that their qualifications will be taken into account. Whether the enumerators are selected by the director or by the several hundred supervisors will make no particular difference, for the supervisors, being patronage appointees, will naturally and inevitably appoint enumerators on a political and patronage basis.

Experience in previous Federal censuses taken under similar bills has proved disastrous in the character of the employees selected, the inaccuracy of the work, and the lack of public credit given the census. The result of the work under such a system is discredited even in advance of the enumeration, for if a party in power has a free choice between a nonpolitical and a political agency for taking the census, and chooses the latter, composed of officials of its own political faith, the presumption is against the fairness of a census so taken. The results will reflect the bias of those who take it. And even if it were fair many would not believe it to be fair. And if at the close of the work inaccuracies are shown, resulting in the advantage of the party by which it is taken, the work is sure to be attributed to political manipulation.

In the census of 1890 the employees were selected without competition, principally upon nomination by Republican Members of Congress. In many places the enumerators were instructed by the supervisors and others to do political work. In New York City, where the enumerators were named by the Republican organization, several men with criminal records secured appointment. Yet private houses were opened to such men with the understanding that the Government considered them trustworthy. Many facts indicated that the New York census was inaccurate and incomplete, and the police authorities, by order of the mayor, had a recount made, which showed a population greater by nearly 200,000 than that given by the Federal authorities. The recount showed that in many wards large numbers of residents, often entire houses, had been omitted. As the enumerators were Republicans, and as the city was preponderantly Democratic it was naturally inferred that the underenumeration was intentional and made for the purpose of reducing the city's representation in Congress.

It was afterward estimated by the director himself that $2,000,000 and more than a year's time would have been saved if the Census Bureau had been placed under the civil service law.

The census of 1900 suffered from the same defect. Senators and Representatives were asked to nominate persons for appointment; and it was inevitable that the appointees should use the power given them for the benefit of their party and of the particular Congressmen through whom they had secured their places. In one Maryland county the returns were deliberately padded in order to secure additional representation in the Maryland House of Delegates for the party in power. For this purpose graveyards and summer hotels were canvassed and imagination was largely drawn upon. In many cases the deceptions were unbelievably crude; small children were listed as school teachers, farm laborers, and carpenters. The Federal grand jury which brought in the indictment said in their report: "So long as such appointments are treated as part of the spoils of politics the recurrence of such frauds and scandals as have been revealed by our investigation may be expected."

The 1890 and 1900 censuses were taken under a provision of law excluding competition; that is, necessitating appointments being made under the spoils system. Every man competent to speak with authority because of his knowledge of and familiarity with the work of those censuses has stated that the result was to produce extravagance and demoralization.

In the 1910 census, although the bill provided that enumerators should be appointed by the supervisors, who, in turn, were appointed by the Director of the Census, at the request of the director these employees were selected through the machinery of the United States Civil Service Commission. A generally satisfactory and reliable census was obtained.

Only recently New York State has had an example of the waste and corruption which follows the distribution as political patronage of such positions as special agents, supervisors, enumerators, and interpreters.

The cost of the 1925 census for the State of New York was estimated at $1,200,000, but this was not sufficient to complete the compilation of statistical information which was intended to be produced. The employees in the New York State Census Bureau were employed without any tests of fitness by the Civil Service Commission. A report issued by an official investigator on behalf of the governor states that about $200,000 was either illegally or wastefully expended under this type of administration.

Two objections have been made to the appointment of census employees through civil-service examination. The argument has been made that the enumerators to be appointed are so numerous and their terms of service so short that it would be undesirable and perhaps impossible to require them to go through the formalities of a civil-service examination. This argument has been answered by the Civil Service Commission itself, as follows:

"The census act for the Thirteenth Census required the commission to hold examinations and establish registers from which appointments were to be made by the Director of the Census. The results of those examinations showed the practicability of supplying eligibles in large numbers in a limited time. On June 30, 1909, the Census Bureau had on its rolls about 650 names of persons employed in Washington. By June 30, 1910, the force had increased to approximately 3,000, and on October 1, 1910, to about 3,650. All of these were appointed as a result of competitive examinations and by selection from the head of the register, with due regard to the apportionment. The 71,500 census enumerators in that census and a large number of special agents, though not classified under the rules, were selected through practical examinations held throughout the United States. The Director of the Census made use of the commission's nearly 5,000 local examining boards, candidates being assembled at points convenient to their places of residence. The results of the application of the merit principle in the Thirteenth Census appear to justify the belief that the same system should be followed in the selection of the personnel required in the Fifteenth Census.

"The commission is of the view that the civil service act and rules are sufficiently flexible to admit of their application in a practicable degree to the field force of the census and that where necessary exception could be made from competition by action of the commission."

The other objection to civil-service examination of these employees is that the 100,000 persons thus added to the Government pay roll and given civil-service status would endeavor to retain Government employment after completion of the census. Such efforts of temporary employees to create for themselves permanent positions could not be successful if Members of Congress would refuse to yield to political pressure put upon them by these employees or their friends. Exemption from examination, and exclusion from the classified civil service, however, would not deter census employees from using all the influence they could muster to permit their transfer or inclusion in the classified service. In fact, this very thing, which it is feared might occur if employees were appointed under the civil service law, has repeatedly occurred in the past, when they were appointed through political patronage.

Past experience shows that the grossest abuses, frauds, inaccuracies, corruption, and extravagance have followed every exemption of census employees from the provisions of the civil service law.

There is no legitimate reason for appointing the census employees without civil-service examination, for

1. The Civil Service Commission states that it is able and ready to fill the places by examination, and already has available lists of thousands of eligibles.

2. In case of an emergency requiring examination to be waived the President has full authority to suspend the civil service law.

Senator WILLIAM C. BRUCE, of Maryland, has introduced an amendment to the pending census bill providing for the appointment of special agents, supervisors, supervisors' clerks, enumerators, and interpreters subject to the civil service law. No valid reason can be advanced why this amendment should not be adopted. Repeated experience shows that while plausible reasons can always be found for including exemptions in a census act the real motive is always to be found in the opportunity thus given for patronage and spoils. The adoption of the Bruce amendment would insure an accurate and reliable census.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CIVIL SERVICE LEAGUE,
